

Hello!

25 Chapters of Wisdom: What Aliens Teach Us

David Johnson

BREADSTAND
urnb.breadstand.com
Methuen, MA USA

Copyright © 2024 David Johnson. All Rights Reserved.

Cover design by David Johnson
Cover copyright © by Breadstand LLC

Breadstand supports the right to free expression and the value of the copyright. The purpose of the copyright is to encourage writers and artists to produce the creative works that enrich our culture.

Breadstand LLC
83 Pleasant Valley St
Methuen, MA 01844
<http://urnb.breadstand.us>

First Edition

The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

ISBN: 979-8-30400-712-2

Table of Contents

Hello! 1

Allow Yourself to Be Open Minded.....2

You Are Infinite Beings.....2

Your Purpose in Life.....3

Integrity.....3

Excitement Is Your Path.....3

All Excitement Is a Thread.....5

Do What Excites You the Most5

Excitement Is a Path and Destination6

We Can Begin to Interact Together6

Our Interaction with Earth Is New7

Face-to-Face Is Too Much for Now.....8

More Integration Is Required10

Use Negative Emotions to Integrate.....10

The Rubber Band12

Thank You for Being Open Minded.....13

How Thoughts Become Things14

You Create Physical Reality with Others.....14

Time Is Societal and Individual	15
Our Time Is Different from Your Time	16
Time Must be Synchronized to Interact	17
How Time Is Created	17
You Create Time and Space	19
As You Integrate Time Contracts.....	20
Repack Your Extra Baggage.....	21
Integration Changes Time	22
Aging	22
Increasing Your Age.....	23
Denial Shortens Your Life.....	24
Own Your Creations	24
Re-Collection.....	25
Open Your Subconscious Closet.....	26
You Can Start Slowly.....	27
Negative Beliefs Are Your Children	27
All Ideas Can Be Positive.....	28
Thoughts You Act On	29
When You're Struggling	30
Denial Creates Space and Time	32
Decide to Be Right Here, Right Now	34
You Create Symbols as an Excuse.....	34
Denial and Disease	35

David Johnson

Living in Joy	36
Conclusion	36
Does the Law of Attraction Work?.....	38
Excitement Can Transform Your Life	39
Choices Change Reality	39
Take Action	40
Own Your Reality	40
Choose the Most Exciting Option	41
It Is Effortless	42
You Exist on Many Levels	42
You Can Choose to Deny This	43
Transformation	44
Validation	44
Your Validation Affects the Universe	45
It Can Be Simple	46
The Details	47
The Path of Least Resistance	47
Excitement Is the Least Resistance	48
Details Can Hold You Back	48
It Is Easy	49
100% Guarantee of Success	49
You Can Let Go of Your Limitations	49

The Keys	50
How to Use Vibrations to Your Advantage	51
Example: Colors = Varying Vibrations	52
More Than You Can Detect	52
Your Signature Vibration	52
Transcendental Vibrations	53
Use Them to Find Solutions	53
You Have a Habit of Being Negative	54
You Can Change Your Habit	54
You Can Change Your Life	55
Good Vibes	55
Beliefs Are Vibrations	56
Vibrations Attract Similar Vibrations	56
Beliefs Filter Vibrations	56
Choose New Beliefs and Act on Them	56
Consciously Recognize Your Beliefs	57
Tune into Good Vibes	58
Conclusion	58
The Core of Change: Decision	60
You Create Reality	61
Expressing More of Who You Are	63
You Have Chosen Limitation	64

David Johnson

Ascending Is Being More.....	64
Being Limited Has Advantages.....	65
Ascension Means Consciously Creating.....	65
It's Your Decision.....	67
You Don't Need to Earn Anything.....	68
You Are Always Deciding.....	68
Be Mindful of Your Decisions.....	70
Decision, Trust, and Action.....	70
The Past Doesn't Define You.....	71
Decide Who You Want to Be.....	72
Actions Reflect Your Decision.....	73
You Assign Meaning to Your Reality.....	73
Maintain Your Decision.....	74
Living Consciously Brings Joy.....	76
We Also Want to Remain Physical.....	77
You Create Your Reality 100%.....	78
You Have to Change First.....	79
Life Can Be Effortless.....	79
Conclusion.....	80
 How to Believe.....	 81
You Are Always Deciding Who You Are.....	82
You Can Decide Who You Are.....	83

The Story You Buy Into	84
Maintain That Decision	85
Trust Is Easy	86
Recognize Your Doubts	87
Trusting a Decision vs. Affirmations	87
“Who I am” vs. “Who I will be”	88
Update Your Decision as Necessary	89
Be Consistent	90
Make Your Decision Stronger	91
Pay Attention to How You Decide	91
Drop the Process and Just Decide	91
“Who Are You?”	92
Don’t Let the Future Decide	93
Remember: You Create Your Reality	94
Conclusion	94
 How to Eliminate Drama	 96
Actuality vs. Apparency	97
Your Response	98
Responding Consciously	99
You Desire to Be Physical	99
Separate Your Perception and Your Action	100
There’s a Buffer	101

David Johnson

You Are Response Able.....	102
Action Appears to Create Your Reality.....	102
Continuity and Persistence.....	103
Remind Yourself Who You Are.....	104
Actions Speak Louder Than Words.....	105
Responding Consciously Is the Key	105
Proof in 3 Days	106
Count to 10.....	106
Be Consistent.....	107
Enjoy the Unexpected	107
You Already Do This	107
Being Responsible Is Not Blame.....	108
Merging Apparency and Actuality.....	109
You May Feel Not Completely in Control	110
Be Kind to Yourself.....	111
Start Acting the Way You Want.....	111
I Hope You Are Excited!.....	112
Living Can Be Easy.....	112
You Attracted This for a Reason.....	113
Summary.....	113
Speaking Is an Action	114
Conclusion	115

When Life Is Not Going the Way You Want.....	117
It's Your Version of Reality	119
"Now" Seems Like a Series of Moments	119
You Already Have What You Need	120
Focus on What Excites You Right Now.....	121
You Are Deciding Right Now.....	122
Consciously Decide Who You Are.....	123
You Create It All.....	124
This Is All a Reflection of You	125
"Now" Is Your Power	126
There Is Not an Off Switch.....	126
Unconditionally Love Yourself.....	126
How to Make Life Effortless	129
Creating Reality Is Effortless.....	130
Allow Yourself to Be You	131
Allow Yourself to Decide Consciously.....	131
Your Reality May Seem the Same	132
Your Response	133
Allow Whatever Interpretation You Have	133
Allow the Interpretation, but Don't Respond	134
Allow Yourself to be You	134
Don't Judge Yourself.....	135

David Johnson

Allow It to Play Out.....	135
Responding Fully Can Be Okay	136
Remember: Allow It to Play Out.....	136
“This stuff doesn’t work!”	137
Purposefully Allow.....	138
Unconditional Love.....	138
Judgment.....	139
Self-Love	141
Leave the Room If You Have To	141
Your Response Is a Message to Realign.....	142
Repetitive Responses.....	142
Nothing Is Extraneous.....	143
Relax, Let Go, and Experience	144
Allow Yourself to Cave In.....	145
Nothing Is Too Overwhelming	145
Align to Your Decision	146
Loosen Up	146
Everyone Sees Things Differently.....	147
Share and Allow.....	147
Allow Other People to Be Themselves.....	148
Responsible “To” Not “For”	149
Allow Reality to Unfold	149
We All Reflect Each Other.....	149

Summary: Purposefully Allow	150
How to Find Your Path	152
Excitement Is Your Guidance.....	153
Clarifying What Excitement Means.....	154
What Excites You Now and Overall.....	155
Excitement Is Your Path	155
Integrity	156
Excitement with Integrity.....	157
Factoring in Excitement.....	157
Using Excitement Is Easy	158
Excitement Is a Barometer.....	158
You Are a Light to Others.....	159
You Always Know What Excites You.....	160
The Magic Lamp	160
You Can Build the Excitement.....	161
Connecting the Dots Creates the Picture.....	162
Remember the Lamp.....	162
Only You Know You	162
We Are Excited to Interact with You	163
Reality Reflects Who You Actually Are	165
Your Reality Is Feedback.....	166
You Interpret That Feedback	167

David Johnson

See All Feedback as Supporting You	168
Be Persistent and Creative	168
Life Is Like an Improv Performance	169
Use All Feedback	170
Take Action	171
You Hold You Back	171
You Are Always Deciding	172
It's All You	172
Allow Your Response	173
Allow, But Don't Act Until Realigned	174
Allow the Negative, But Trust	175
Eventually, It Will Be Automatic	176
Conclusion	176
 When Things Don't Go As Expected.....	 178
Trust Is Important	179
Time	179
You Chose to Be Finite	180
You Create Space and Time	181
Being Limited Has Advantages	181
You Have Chosen This	182
Your Point of View Is Very Narrow	182
You Are Beginning to Remember	183

It's Always Right Here, Right Now	183
Identify Where You Place Your Trust.....	184
Trust the Timing.....	185
Trust That You Get What You Want	186
Focus on the Most Exciting Option	187
More About Integrity.....	188
Act with Integrity.....	189
Excitement Is Your Guidance.....	190
Delays Are in Your Favor	190
Choose to Trust You Get What You Want.....	191
In a Nutshell: Trust Your Timing	191
Assume Things Are Going Well.....	192
Expressing Yourself Is Contagious.....	193
The Ultimate Truth.....	193
A Truth Is a Way, Not the Way.....	194
Condoning a Truth Is Expressing It.....	195
All Truths Are Valid	195
Validating Truths Gives You Strength.....	196
Allowing All Truths Makes Things Easier	196
Expressing Yourself Serves Others	197
Reminder: You Get What You Want.....	198
Conclusion	199

David Johnson

Use Negativity to Find Alignment	200
You Are Extraterrestrials	201
You Are Experts at Focus.....	201
You Are Expanding Your Views.....	202
Your Awareness Increases	203
Reality Exists within You.....	204
We Are All Teachers and Students	204
You Exist within My Consciousness.....	205
Creating Your Reality Consciously	205
Conscious Unknowingness.....	206
You Are One Whole	206
Step 1: You Decide Who You Are	207
Step 2: You Trust That Decision	207
Step 3: You Act.....	208
Creating Consciously.....	208
Opportunities.....	208
Remind Yourself of Your Decision.....	209
Obstacles Can Be Road Signs.....	210
An Example: Paying a Bill.....	210
You're Always Using Your Power	212
Relabel Your Liabilities as Assets.....	212
The Bill Is a Symbol	213
Opportunities Are All Around.....	213

Embrace the Opportunities.....	214
Your Society Enjoys Limitation.....	214
We Will Remain Unobtrusive for Now.....	215
You Are Home.....	216
We Honor You as Creators.....	216
Be a Role Model.....	217
Global Communication Represents Expansion.....	218
Empowerment Not Dependence.....	218
Everything Is Actually You	219
Conclusion	219
 Act Like an Owner.....	 221
Act Like an Owner.....	222
The Wild Card Phrase.....	222
Fear	223
Anger	224
Accept What Anger Is Telling You	224
Apply the Wild Card	225
Prolonged Anger Is Invalidating Yourself.....	225
Validate What You Don't Prefer	226
Frustration and Boredom.....	226
How It Serves You.....	226
Exciting Options Are in Front of You.....	227

David Johnson

Use the Wild Card in Any Situation	228
How to Turn Negatives into Positives: Part 1	230
You Decide What's Positive or Negative	231
Example: Change Seems Complex	231
Example: A Cube	232
How Do You Choose to See It?	233
Assign the Meaning That It Has All Changed	233
You Get to Decide	234
Choose Consciously	234
Assign the Meaning You Prefer	234
Take Back Your Power	235
Consciously Assign Meaning	235
Situations Are Messages	236
Act Like a Creator	237
You Are Experts	237
Your Actions Reflect the Assignment	238
Pause Before You Act	238
This Reality Is One of Polarity	238
Action	239
Changing Yourself Changes Everything	240
It Is Up to You	241
Our Relationship with You	241

We Desire to Share Self-Empowerment.....	242
Be Open-Minded.....	242
We Enjoy Interacting with You.....	242
We Are All Equal.....	243
Be an Example.....	243
You Are Not Drowning.....	243
We Will Probably Not Be First.....	244
 How to Turn Negatives into Positives: Part 2.....	 245
Interpretations Lead to Actions.....	245
Your Life Is Like a Play.....	246
From Negative to Neutral to Positive.....	247
Blessings in Disguise.....	247
An Opportunity to Accelerate Your Life.....	248
Accelerate Your Life.....	249
Relabeling Brings Up Other Limiting Beliefs.....	249
Blessings Are All Around You.....	250
Our Perspective.....	251
Conclusion.....	252
 A Very Powerful Alignment Tool.....	 253
An Alignment Exercise.....	253
Imagination Is One of Your Abilities.....	256
Focus.....	256

David Johnson

Focus on What Excites You.....	257
Remember, You Assign the Meaning	257
Focus Positively	258
Interpreting Reality as the Preferred You	258
You Already Do This	259
There Is Always a Positive Perspective	259
It's Not Rose-Colored Glasses	260
It's Not Denial But Acceptance.....	261
Your Personal Template	261
You Are the Only One Who Knows You	262
Your Focus Can Be Conscious	262
Change Your Focus, Change Your Life	263
Decide, Trust, and then Act.....	264
From Shifting Focus to Consistent Focus.....	265
It's Simple	265
Stability	266
You Can't Backslide.....	266
Maintain Positive Focus.....	266
Reality Reflects Your Focus	267
Relationships Become Effortless.....	268
Everyone Is Perfect.....	268
Be Conscious About How You Focus Yourself.....	269
You Contain It All.....	270

Conclusion	270
An Extremely Powerful Tool: The Referential Preferential You	272
The Power of the Imagination	272
A Guided Meditation	273
Decide You Are That You	279
Your Referential Preferential You.....	280
A Powerful Tool.....	281
Initially, It Might Seem like a Process.....	282
Walk Toward Your Positive Self.....	283
This Is How We Live.....	283
Your Physical Body Will Change	283
Conclusion	285
How to Clarify Your Vision.....	286
Clear Intention	286
Excitement.....	287
A Clarification Exercise.....	288
Reason 1: Judgment by Society.....	289
Reason 2: You Fear You Cannot Have It.....	290
Reason 3: You Cannot Handle It.....	290
Clear Intention Creates a Template.....	291
You Already Do This	292
Act on What Is Available	293

David Johnson

Conclusion	294
Define Yourself and Accept Your Deservability	295
Definitions	296
Definitions Contrary to Your Vision	296
Make a List of Definitions You Prefer	297
Acknowledge Your Contrary Definitions	298
How Would This Feel?	298
Use the Referential Preferential You	299
Persistence	299
Pay Attention to Your Definitions	300
You Can't Get Rid of Beliefs	301
Which Belief Are You Expressing?	301
Allow and Validate Negative Definitions	302
Deservability	303
You Are the Only One Who Judges You	304
Deservability Is a Given	305
You Will See the Deservability of Others	306
Use Your Reality as Evidence	306
You Are Learning to Express Your Power	306
Grant Yourself Deservability	307
Conclusion	308
How to Use Action.....	309

Action	310
Action Is a Form of Spirituality.....	310
Keep Your Feet on the Ground	311
Your Actions Reflect Your Beliefs.....	311
Act According to Preference.....	313
Pay Attention to How You're Acting	313
Act on the Options Available	314
You Can Have Anything You Desire.....	315
Excitement Leads Your Intention	315
Lamenting Gets You Nowhere.....	316
Now Is the Time to Act.....	316
The World Is Transforming Positively.....	317
Each One of You Makes a Difference	317
Change Actions Change Results	318
Now Is the Time for Conscious Action.....	318
Use the Referential Preferential You.....	319
Act on the Most Exciting Option Available.....	320
Challenge: Act According to Preference	321
Conclusion	321
 Be Yourself.....	 323
You Are a Gift to Others	324
You Are Only This You, Once.....	324

David Johnson

Expressing Yourself Is Your Greatest Gift.....	324
Only You Know Who You Are.....	325
You Have a 100% Unique Perspective.....	325
Not Being Yourself Deprives Others	326
Being Yourself Makes Your Life Better	327
Being Yourself Is the Easiest Path.....	327
Being Yourself Will Surprise You	328
Give Freely Without Insisting Acceptance.....	328
Being Yourself Will Give You Relief.....	329
Being Yourself Will Improve Situations.....	329
Offering Your Perspective Gives Options	330
You Decide Who You Are	331
Use Your Power Consciously.....	332
Circumstances Don't Decide.....	333
Trust Your Decision	334
You Have Everything You Need	335
Conclusion	336
 How to Speed Up Manifestations.....	 337
Hope vs Intention	338
The Most Exciting Option Available.....	339
Focus on Excitement, Not Details.....	339
Act on What Is Exciting	340

Focus on the Excitement, Not Why	341
Continue to Focus on What's Available	342
Excitement Takes Care of the Details	342
Little Shifts Are All It Takes	344
You Can Have It All	345
You Have Great Power	346
We Respect You	347
You Get to Choose	348
Embrace the Unexpected	348
Conclusion	350
 How to Build Momentum	 351
Thoughts Don't Create Reality	352
Preparing Reinforces the Worst	352
Use Your Imagination	353
This Is an Easy Process	354
From Automatic to Conscious	355
You Contain All the Answers	356
You Always Deliver the Best to Us	357
 How to Deal with People	 359
Validating Truths Give You Options	360
Interacting with People	361
No, Thank You	361

David Johnson

The Perspective of Others Are Gifts	361
That's Their Story	362
Everything You Attract Serves a Purpose	363
You Don't Have to Agree with Everyone.....	364
Validate Everything.....	364
No Need for Persuasion	365
Remember: Be Yourself.....	366
Conclusion	367
 How to Manifest Something	 368
I3DA	368
Failure	370
Success	370
Timing Is Important.....	371
Choose What Is Available.....	372
That Action Will Serve You.....	373
Maintaining Your Intention Is Success.....	373
Excitement Is Your Proof.....	374
Anxiety	374
Right Here, Right Now.....	375
Life Will Feel Fresh	375
Always Be Successful.....	375
Fear of Failure (or Success)	376

Conclusion	377
-------------------------	-----

David Johnson

Note from Publisher

This book is my personal interpretation, opinion, and transcription of the channeled recordings of Elan and Bashar from the planet Essesani. The narrators are intended to be Elan and Bashar. I enhanced and clarified the text as I felt appropriate.

Skip Around

This book is designed to be used as a collection of tools and supports. You don't have to read it in order. We suggest looking at the table of contents and picking the chapter that excites you the most right now.

Hello!

Hello. It is nice to meet you. We hope you are well. This book of 25 chapters can help you improve your life and get more of what you want. If you understand the Law of Attraction, you will be right at home. If not, then we think you will still find it useful. Understanding the Law of Attraction is not necessary.

Before we begin, we think it would be helpful to build some common ground between us. First, we are “extraterrestrials.” While you may think that makes us different, in many ways, we actually are very similar to you. We have bodies. We live on a planet. And we are more physically like you than you might imagine and a lot less like those alien photos. We are about 5 feet tall. We have one head, one torso, two arms, and two legs. Our skin is sort of white-gray. Our eyes are almond-shaped with a slight lift at the end. If you had to compare us to a race, we would be closest to Mongolians.

Hello

We don't care whether you believe what we tell you. No. What we offer is a gift. We offer it freely, and you do not have to accept it. Gift-giving is free, after all.

You can accept what we say if you want to and if you like the concepts we share, feel free to use them as you will. If not, I promise that you will find something else that holds meaning for you. We will say it again. You don't have to believe anything we're saying because we say it. Nope.

Allow Yourself to Be Open Minded

We suggest that you keep an open mind. We know this may be new to you. Try things on and see what works for you. You may find that if you are interested in growing, developing, or self-empowering yourself that what we have to share is helpful.

Similarly, if you offered us gifts, we may accept them, or we may not. However, we assure you when we do not, we are not invalidating or showing a lack of appreciation for your offering. We validate all viewpoints and all realities.

When it comes to the concept of "what is true," we see the ultimate truth as being composed of all truths. All perspectives have a right and reason to be. Therefore, all truths are true for those who have them at that time. It is not simply "this or that." It is "this and that." You have a choice.

You Are Infinite Beings

You know, or are becoming aware, that you are reincarnational beings. This means that you are multidimensional, infinite, and eternal. Each of you moves from face to face, from scenario to scenario, to grow and to experience. What is important is that you will only be the you that you are now, one time. You will never be this you ever again. Embrace it.

Your Purpose in Life

When we talk about these things, many of you want to know with great curiosity, “What is my purpose in life? What is my mission in life?” Our answer is that your purpose is to be the best you can be in any given moment and to live your life to the fullest and with integrity.

Integrity

Integrity is an important word. Our definition of “integrity” is in no way, shape, or form a moral judgment. Integrity means to act with the understanding that all things are interconnected and part of the one whole and all that is. When you look at everything around you as a part of yourself, you don’t need to force yourself on others. You don’t need to inflict your point of view or pressure them. You don’t need to hurt yourself or others ever. When we say “with integrity,” we mean with understanding the ultimate oneness of all.

Excitement Is Your Path

You might ask, “Alright. I understand what you are saying. I know that being the best me that I can makes sense, but how do I go about being the best that I can?”

Hello

Thank you very much for asking. I will answer. What you label as “excitement” on your planet has different meanings. Let us explain. We see it as your arrow, your barometer, and your way to see that which is most you. To us, excitement is defined as follows:

Excitement: the physicalized translation of the vibratory energy of the path that you chose to be on in this lifetime.

Simply put, this is why certain things are exciting to you and maybe not to someone else. What excites you, what allows you to feel attraction for it, love for it, is your indication from what you sometimes label your “higher self,” that this is most you.

There are many belief systems. You create your reality through what you believe. Your belief systems create your physical reality, and I mean that literally. If you believe that living a life of excitement is one of frivolity and is one of “hedonism,” that is simply a viewpoint.

When we say to act on your excitement, we mean that you should do so with integrity. This means it will not harm you or anyone else. That is part of the criteria to determine whether this is your pure excitement or not. In contrast, anxiety is excitement with a negative interpretation.

Often you have bought into the idea that society has ingrained within you from childhood that following your excitement is frivolous. However, you can also change that belief. You probably can accept that if you are not hurting yourself or others, if you are always being of service to those you interact with, and if you are having an exciting time while you are doing it, that is okay. That does not violate any of the ideas that you label frivolity.

If you allow yourself to be excited and recognize what excites you with integrity, you will define what is most you. That is the first step.

Once you do this, you may find that you are not doing what excites you in life. When you realize that, then you can initiate momentum toward what truly excites you.

All Excitement Is a Thread

We want to clarify excitement a bit further. When we say, “What excites you,” we are asking what excites you the most in your entire life. We know that this may not be immediately obvious to you. So, you may ask, “How do I get to this distant point?” Alright, fair enough.

All excitement is one excitement. All excitement is a thread. You are the being that you are, one complete being. Everything that excites you is an expression of that one complete being, and therefore all your excitement is interrelated, even though it may not appear that way.

Do What Excites You the Most

To get some momentum going, look at what choices you have right now that you can act on. Pick the choice that excites you the most and that you can act on with integrity. Even though it may seem to have nothing to do with the thing that excites you the most, it does. It is integrally related. It will lead you to the next thing that will excite you because excitement is a thread. It's all connected.

If you follow your moment-to-moment excitement, what you will find is that you acquire the tools, the knowledge, and the resources to do the most exciting thing that you cannot do right now. You do this automatically, and you do this anyway.

Excitement Is a Path and Destination

What we are suggesting is that you can have a very exciting, fun, joyous, ecstatic life. Being in ecstasy, living excitement, having fun, and loving life, is not only an end goal (although you can have it this way if you choose to, and many on your planet do), it can also be the path.

If you shoot off into the distance searching for that thing that will finally make you happy and excited, it takes a long time, and by the time you get there, you don't have much practice at being happy or excited. Begin now to be excited and to make life the path and the destination. Know that the destination is always changing, always growing, and always expanding.

We Can Begin to Interact Together

What we are sharing with you is a way to empower yourself and create the life and the reality that you prefer. Many of you have experienced creating a reality that you do not prefer; maybe something different would be preferable. You are at the point where you are ready to take back your power, to live your life, to create your life the way you like it, and with that, we can interact with you.

There's a reason for this. Everything is composed of vibration. You are each a vibration. The differences in your vibrations determine the differences in your physical beingness. You are one person with your own unique vibration. Another person has a different vibration. You can only experience the reality that you are the vibration of.

Our vibration is one of unconditional love and light and of living a life that excites us. Our vibration is a recognition that anything that occurs in our life is ecstatic and joyful. We only attract the people, colloquially speaking, into our lives who can serve us the most at any given moment. We are conscious of this idea.

You are another vibration. However, your vibration has now come to a sufficient frequency to enable us to interact with you since we can only experience the reality we are the vibration of. The fact that we can communicate with you now is your signal, if you choose to acknowledge this, that you are becoming that vibration, and that shift enables us to perceive you. Otherwise, you would be invisible to us, we would be invisible to you, and we would be far too alien to you, and you to us, to have meaningful interaction. Such was the state of your mass consciousness hundreds of years ago.

Our Interaction with Earth Is New

Our interaction with your planet is relatively new, but there are many other beings out there. There are many planets and many worlds. There are indeed billions of galaxies, as your scientists now acknowledge. Many have been in contact with your planet for hundreds and thousands of your years. Many have interacted with you in times past, in ancient times, with your societies in a physicalized, blatant way. Some of those are still around. Others are on their way.

Hello

Face-to-Face Is Too Much for Now

The reason that we choose, at this point, to communicate with you in this fashion rather than face-to-face is twofold. First, the vibrations between us are very different. We do not mean this to indicate that we are any better or any worse. We look at all as equal in quality. There is a quantitative difference in our vibrations.

We are less physical than you, and as a result, our vibration is higher. We function on a slightly higher vibratory field than you. Each being has a bio-energetic field around its body, such as what you might label your aura. Different bio-energetic fields are like gears that are spinning at different rates. The higher vibration is a faster turning gear. The lower vibration is a slower turning gear. When you bring these two together, the effect is to slow the faster turning gear, while the greater effect is to rapidly accelerate the slower turning gear.

How this translates in your reality is, shall we say, a bit tumultuous. We operate and function as 100% whole beings. You, on the other hand, have chosen, and we are not denigrating this approach but merely pointing it out to, in a sense, chop yourself up into parts and hide aspects from each other. You have created convenient compartments to hide your subconscious, your super conscious, your unconscious, and so on.

When your vibration is forced to a higher level, the things you have shut down within your subconscious closet rush to the surface and may create fear in some. This is why these closets were created to begin with.

We have noticed that when beings on your planet interact with various extraterrestrial beings, they have an experience of what you may label “psychotic shock,” an intense fear reaction. They can’t handle it. We have no desire, in any way, shape, or form, to elicit this reaction from you.

We view all forms and expressions of consciousness, from the lowest vibratory nature to the highest vibratory nature, as equal. Therefore, we can only communicate with you in a blatant and physically honest manner when you view us as equals.

Now, many of you place us above you. Alright. We are not, nor do we desire to be. We have all the power we need to create our reality, and we don’t need any of yours. You don’t need any of anybody else’s. You have your own power.

We have noticed in your society a penchant, or a propensity, to pay more attention to the messenger than the message, to fall on your knees and bow. This is not our desire. We wish to communicate with you as equals, as individuals, face-to-face, eye-to-eye.

More Integration Is Required

When you are willing, of your own volition, to integrate those portions of yourself that you have hidden, colloquially speaking, you integrate as a being. You are always a 100% being, but we have noticed on your planet that many individuals use 90% of that power to make it appear as though they are only using 10%. Very creative.

You are 100% beings, and when you see that whatever is in your experience or your reality serves you and it allows you to integrate these buried ideas, then you will use what you already have to integrate yourself. We will talk more about integration in other chapters, but essentially what we mean is that you will learn to see and accept that all of reality is you, was created by you, and is a part of you.

Use Negative Emotions to Integrate

Allow me to make the following illustration. People often want to avoid feeling bad and suffering. Feeling bad is something people “bum out about.” However, feeling bad is one of your main keys to integration. What you label as a “weakness” and something wrong is actually one of your greatest “strengths.” It is not something to be avoided but embraced.

Let’s talk about how your reality is created a little bit. There is “all that is” or “God.” That breaks itself down into parts, and it does so in the following way or steps. As a base, understand that “all that is” exists. It simply is.

1. The first separation is the idea of knowingness. This is the idea that you have limited knowledge. Unlike “all that is,” you have limited knowledge.
2. The next separation is the idea of belief systems. Your knowledge is focused through your beliefs. Not only do you know things, but you have opinions about them. Those are your beliefs.
3. The next step is emotion. Your beliefs have feelings attached to them. Some things feel good, and some feel bad. Your emotions are reactions to your beliefs. Any emotion that you have is a reaction to a belief.
4. The last is thought patterns. Those beliefs and feelings ultimately generate the thoughts you think. Your thoughts are not coming from nowhere. They are being continually created based upon your beliefs.

If you feel bad, then you have beliefs that you probably want to change. Feeling bad is your sign that you have beliefs that you can change. But if you deny your feeling, then you cannot change your belief and, therefore, not change your experience.

To change your belief, you must own it. You must know what it is. You must be willing to admit it to yourself when you feel bad that emotion comes from a belief. Allow yourself to assess in an honest fashion: “What must I believe to be feeling this way?” If you are honest, you will nail down the belief. That is owning it. Then you can change it.

You have allowed beliefs to be ingrained within you. When you change those beliefs, you can live the life you prefer and integrate the things you have hidden, the things you are not willing to be honest about and own. You can only create a reality that you can handle. You cannot create any reality that you cannot cope with. If you are creating it, you know how to use it.

The Rubber Band

Rather than avoiding your negative feelings, use them to hone in on the beliefs that no longer serve you. If you do, the integrative process will be very swift. In other words, you can use your negative feelings as a signpost so that you can find happiness and joy more quicker. But this only happens if you own them. Many chapters in this book will help you do that.

We use the analogy of a “rubber band.” On your planet, one of the things that you are exploring is extreme negativity. Contrast that with positivity. The third option is the integration of both.

You have tended to lean toward the negative in your society. Right now, the vestiges of that negativity are bubbling up on the face of your planet. They will have very different outcomes than they have in your past. This will be the signpost that this is the transitional age.

If you pull a rubber band very tight and consider this negativity, when you let it go, it will rocket in the opposite positive direction. That is the accelerative effect of the transformational age.

The negativity you experience is you pulling the rubber band. When you let go, and the rubber band is released, it does not take much time to create rapid, accelerative travel to positivity. This is the transformation that your planet is now going through. It is what you may label “the New Age.”

Thank You for Being Open Minded

This is a unique time on your planet. This is a time when you can integrate in a single lifetime. That is another reason we can communicate with you now. For co-creating with us in this manner, for your openness to explore in the hope that you “just might” create your reality, for your desire to be open-minded enough to look at the possibilities of other whole worlds, different societies, and other entire civilizations, I thank you. I hope the material we share may be of service to you.

How Thoughts Become Things

When it comes to manifesting or trying to understand why something is manifesting, it helps to understand how you create the physical materiality in your life to begin with. We want to answer questions like “Which thoughts become things?” And “How is reality created?” Related to those is the question of “How is time and space itself created?”

First of all, you are infinite, eternal, and multidimensional beings. This means, in the truest sense of the word “eternal,” that you have no beginning, no middle, and no ending. Take a moment to grasp that concept.

You Create Physical Reality with Others

In the overall sense of your being, however, within that infinity, within that totality, you express your beingness in many ways. One of those ways, just one, is in this particular reality that you call the “physical reality.”

Within physical reality, there is this idea of unfoldment. This means that there is a before, during, and after. When you manifest physically in this reality, you intentionally forget that you know it all. You forget that you are infinite and eternal. You then, little by little, remember who you are.

In addition, in a very general sense, you have agreed with the other individuals so that your reality can be synchronized with each other in terms of it unfolding at a certain rate. Each person creates their reality 100% completely, and in order to co-create together, they are synchronized. While it seems impossible that each person could create their own reality and simultaneously share a reality, it is true. That is a paradox.

Time Is Societal and Individual

You create time; however, you as a society agree to be synchronized in a time stream. This allows you to have minor individual variations in how you create time and yet experience time in a similar fashion. When you create time, you do it in a way that is synchronized, to some extent, with others.

Often, even during your day-to-day reality, you may create time in a slightly different flow in comparison to everyone else. Perhaps less of it, which you then perceive as “time flies by,” or perhaps more of it, which you perceive as “time is dragging along.” But it is your creation, and there is a standardization, to some degree, between all individuals within a given mass consciousness in a society.

Our Time Is Different from Your Time

To understand better how time is created and synchronized, you can compare the way you create time to the way we create time. Our particular society is also, to some degree, synchronized to itself in that we still, to some degree, create time. Our relationship and experience of that time are far different. However, we still create it, and there still is a rate and flow at which we synchronize with each other for some degree of a common experience.

We exist in a different dimension of experience, and this is why you would not at this time physically perceive our star without a few adjustments in that dimension. There are some unique things about the nature of that difference in dimensionality. Although this, to some degree, will have particular extensions into our physicality, which we will not discuss at this time, one of these more obvious differences is that we exist in a different dimension that is not synchronized to yours.

We cannot physically perceive each other without adjustments. This is due to the fact that our particular stream of time in reference and comparison to your own is approximately, and this is, again quite arbitrary, quite approximate, but 10 times faster than your own. Therefore, what you perceive to be, for example, 30 years of time, would translate into our history as approximately 300 years of time.

Time Must be Synchronized to Interact

Without synchronization, there simply would be no sense to be made from one dimension of experience to another. When we interact with you, we do so from our particular relative stream of time. It may seem to us that simply days have passed, but it is synchronized when we interact with you and to your time stream so that it makes some type of sense to you and so that it seems to have some continuity from one interaction to another.

It is not necessarily the one-to-one relationship that you might imagine. For instance, you might perceive, many times, that we have had four or five particular discrete interactions, but from my end, we may perceive them as one interaction.

There will not always be a one-to-one correspondence. We can, however, tap into where and when our communications are coming through to you and make some kind of logistical sense to it in your terms of before, during, and after other sessions. Again, even this is quite an arbitrary creation.

How Time Is Created

To get back to the idea of how thoughts become things and, therefore, how time and space are created, we will use the following analogy. You have “a theory” that you call “the Big Bang.” What this represents, from our perspective, is the intersection of consciousness itself, which is transcendental, with physical reality itself. Realize that physical reality is basically a physicalized representation of what you believe.

That intersection, the point at which physical reality meets consciousness, creates a spark. Initially, that spark will be perceived in a particular given space of physical reality as initially nothing, and then “something,” but one “something.”

Now again, this is all quite colloquial and is more for the purposes of analogy than direct, precise information, but simply follow along, and you will understand the analogy.

First of all, allow us to extend the definition that your society and even your physicists have, which is that space and time, formerly believed to be two discrete ideas, are simply two sides of the same coin. Even in your science, it is now labeled “space-time” rather than simply each individual component.

Understand that this makes sense. With the creation of space, then comes the necessity of time to travel across it and to be able to make some sense out of it. This is one of the presentations that time itself will represent.

So, following on the analogy of a singular point, at that singular point, at the time of its manifestation, there is no time. There is simply one point. There is no space to cover, nowhere to go, and nothing to do. There is no need for the creation of time to do it in.

But when that one point, as an analogy, explodes out to many billions and billions of separate ideas radiating out 360 degrees in all directions, you then, from that center and that singular point, create, between that singular point and the point of dispersion, space, space from a point to another point. As you create more space, you simultaneously also create time, time in which to traverse the space itself.

In other words, reality is a physicalized representation of your ideas. It's sort of like walking around inside your mind, except that physical reality is only a reflection of your beliefs rather than all the things you think. While you seem to exist within a universe, the universe actually exists within you.

Obviously, if everything is all one idea, there is no necessity for time, but the moment there is a single separation, the moment there is a single divergence from a single point, there is then the necessity of time.

We hope this is clear so far. If it is not, please take a moment to take it all in before proceeding. We know these concepts are new and very different from your previous understandings.

You Create Time and Space

As you separate from the one, in the aforementioned analogy, you create more space, you create more time, and you also then, by definition, create more separation.

Allow us to "bring this analogy home," so to speak. This may sound abstract, but it will directly relate to your life and to your personal experience. Using the aforementioned analogy of the "Big Bang," when you contract the points back to the center, you then correspondingly create less space between the points and, therefore, less time necessary to extend to each point.

In this reality, you are exploring separation and limitation, and therefore you create more space. Space itself is a symbol of the fragmentation within you. In this physical world, each thing is actually a symbolic representation of something in your consciousness. Each thing is something you wish to explore.

Separation is represented by the space between things. This gives you the experience that you did not create the reality and that it is separate from you. This gives you the experience that there is some power greater than you out there.

The more you distance yourself from the person you choose to be, the more physical space and time you will create. When you do that, you also need and automatically create more time. This means the physical things you desire will be kept apart from you in both time and space. They will not manifest in your experience.

You will always have, colloquially speaking, “enough time” to explore each and every minute corner of each and every minute separation that you have created.

As You Integrate Time Contracts

This also works in an inverse or opposite way as well. You create your reality 100%. 100%! What that 100% means is that everything in that reality, 100% of everything, fits. 100% of everything is your creation. When you act on this knowledge and accept that you created it all and see why, you integrate them, one at a time. This results in things manifesting more easily.

In the integration, it is as if the many points are contracting back to the center point. The more you accept that you created your reality, the more you can then see how everything was created by you to serve you in a positive way. You will then allow the reality to deliver to you the messages it is trying to deliver. When you do this, you need less time.

Repack Your Extra Baggage

When you realize that these creations were made by you, perhaps from unconscious beliefs in your past, before you knew you had a choice, before you knew you could consciously choose your beliefs, you may find you have some “extra baggage” to incorporate. It seems like extra baggage, but the idea is that it is not. It is part of who you are.

You can open those suitcases and repack the contents within you. This means you can look at the things you denied that you created and see how you did create them to serve you and then integrate them back into the whole.

Therefore, the more you view things as not being a part of you, the more you create an attitude of separation, which then creates the physical experience of things being held apart from you. In other words, manifestations are slower.

On the other hand, if you have the attitude that you created it all, it belongs to you, and you see how each thing serves you, you then have the attitude of integration. This allows things to physically come back to the center, and physical space and time contracts. This means things manifest faster.

Integration Changes Time

When you realize and accept that you created everything, whether you like it or not, and then you view those things in a positive way, that is integration. That is owning your reality.

You can use the things you don't like to help you nail down the foundational primary beliefs that still limit you. Once you do that, you can accept them and appreciate what they allowed you to do, and then you can decide what new beliefs you prefer. When you act on those new beliefs, you make it official that you own your reality, and then you integrate the space in the totality of your consciousness that then necessitates "time" to experience them. In short, you improve your manifestations.

When you own your reality and realize that you created it, you become grateful for the things you used to label as bad. You realize that those things actually contained the jewels of positivity and self-reflection that allowed you to live a better life. When that happens, you literally change the rate of time relative to society as a whole. Sometimes you simply perceive that "time is flying by quite quickly."

Aging

When you say, "time has flown by, and I had a good time," it is not truly the time that has passed any faster. When you "have a good time," you are being fully who you are and expressing less separation. You are not focused on denying your reality and pushing it away. In that integrated state of awareness, you literally create less time.

So, if 1 or 2 hours have passed by your mass consciousness clock time, and you have seemed to experience only 20 or 25 minutes, your body and your consciousness, so to speak, mentality, have only aged 20 or 25 minutes.

Increasing Your Age

Obviously, you can see that this would have far-reaching effects on your physical body itself. This is why lifespans are increasing, and it is the result of more often honoring and validating who you are. You do this and can increase it by granting validity to the things with integrity that move you, give you passion, and excite you. Those things represent who you are. They represent you acting as an integrated whole rather than separate parts. When you accept rather than fight reality, you allow yourself to collect each and every part back together. This can take a long time. But don't worry; you will make all the time you need to do so.

What we are saying is that if you wish to experience and create time at a flow that represents your integration, your lifespan will increase.

Even if you define that your physical lifespan is 100 years, from our particular understanding of your physiognomy, this is only one-third of your potential. You can live 300 years. The fact that you reach only one-third of that is a direct result of your style of creation of time.

Denial Shortens Your Life

If you spend the majority of that one-third of the time in misery, by denying that you created it all, you create two to three hundred years' worth of the passage of time. But, because that is not synchronized to your particular society, you seem to only have lived 100 years, or perhaps quite a bit less in some instances.

This is all there is to it. Stop denying your creations as, "Why is this happening to me? Poor me! What will I do? What did I ever do to deserve that miserable thing?" That is a perspective. That is an approach. That is an attitude.

We are making light of your approach in order to allow you to enjoy what we are saying. Understand that we are not criticizing it when we do so, but simply, sometimes, members of your society seem to appreciate hearing how it sounds from a third person's point of view. We are not making fun of you, and we are not saying that what you are doing is any worse, qualitatively, than what we are suggesting, but having some fun in the course of communicating with you.

When you deny your reality, you remove your ability to use it. If you deny it, "Why is this happening to me," you are not looking at it as your creation and then cannot treat it and transform it as your creation. You approach it as an external idea. This slows down your life and manifestations.

Own Your Creations

Start by saying, "Well, alright. Alright. Alright. Here is the creation that I have created, but it is not one that I prefer, so therefore, I am not looking at it as my creation. If I simply assume that because I created it all, this is not an exception, and if I assume that this is my creation, I understand that anything I create, no matter how it looks, contains both potentials for positive and negative manifestation. Therefore, since I know I created it, and I know on some level, as I create levels, what I am doing, I will simply approach it from the perspective: 'How does it serve me exactly the way it is?' Not 'if it was this' or 'if it was that,' but exactly the way it is."

When you do that and shift your perspective, even just one minute bit to this particular perspective, you then give yourself one of the only chances you will have to integrate it rather than deny it. Denial is continued separation and physically results in things being kept from you.

Denial is the pushing or partitioning of parts within you. On the other hand, when you acknowledge that you created it all, that is integration itself. It is the glue of unconditional love within you that allows you to collect back what you have formerly labeled separations within you. It allows you to re-collect yourself into a discrete singular being with a singular integrated presentation and experience. The things you prefer come into your experience more easily.

Re-Collection

Therefore, what we are sharing with you as the recollection, is, on the one hand, the recollection of this information that we are sharing, which you already know on some level, or you would simply not understand a word that I am saying. But, it is also the literal recollection of what you have denied within you.

Open Your Subconscious Closet

Sometimes people talk about a subconscious closet. They don't mean the subconscious portion of your consciousness that allows for the automatic pilot of your body and so forth, but the closet that you "stuff things into," so to speak. What allows the "stuffing" and feeling of this closet is denial itself.

When you deny something, you may think it will go away, but it doesn't. When you deny something, it does not go away because you are all of creation. There is nowhere to hide it. There is nowhere to put it. There is no outside. To try to hide it, you "tuck it," colloquially speaking, into a closet you call the "subconscious" or perhaps a "dungeon."

Fortunately, you can smash the lock from that dungeon. You can thrust open that dungeon door and, one at a time, acknowledge your creations, but not from the perspective of "Why me," but from the perspective of "Alright. I now understand that this is a creation that resulted from an unconscious belief that I no longer prefer, but I wish to acknowledge it. I wish to see what the belief is because I know I cannot change it unless I first see it, unless I first own it."

When you call forth the members of the dungeon by being honest with yourself about what you believe, you allow things to come to the surface. Once you do that, you can then reinterpret them in an integrative way. Your physical reality will then change to reflect that.

You Can Start Slowly

Perhaps at first, this may seem a little overwhelming. You may not be ready to open the door all the way. Feel free, if you wish, to use the analogy of a door, to simply crack it, and at least allow things a bit at a time to seep out. If you deny those things, don't worry, they will be put back in the closet, and you will get a chance to look at them later. But if you acknowledge them, you will slowly empty out the closet and perhaps eventually shut it down.

It is all up to you. The creations you stuff back in the closet, however, have a particular tendency to be "disturbing." That's because the harder and farther you push them into the closet, the louder they will knock, the more they will rattle their chains, the more they will bang on the walls, and the more you will be aware of them. This is because, ultimately, they are your creations. They are part of you. They are aspects of yourself you're refusing to be honest about. You cannot truly deny anything about yourself.

Negative Beliefs Are Your Children

If you can invite them, one by one, as your children, rather than your prisoners, you can then see why you created these children, how they serve you, and what it is they allow you to discover about yourself. You will see how you can use them to transform yourself in a positive way.

We remind you there is absolutely nothing, unless your definition says that there is, there is absolutely nothing that you can find out about yourself, no matter “how awful,” that you cannot use in a positive way.

If you are willing to approach it from that perspective, you can use it in a positive way. There is no need to fear anything in the closet.

All Ideas Can Be Positive

We understand that owning your reality and facing it can be frightening. However, we are offering you a different perspective. Owning your reality is what allows the symbols to deliver their messages so that you can use them in a positive way. The negative aspects are messages that you refuse to receive.

When you instead call forth an idea from your subconscious closet, acknowledge it, appreciate it; it may be outdated, it may be obsolete, but appreciate that it has led you to this point, and choose anew, with eyes open, having equalized it, it does not go back into the closet. Then it integrates into your totality. It becomes a part of you that is no better or no worse. It has no less or more weight than anything else, but because you are choosing a positive perspective, the negative aspects of it will simply be irrelevant.

Remember, you contain it all. Often people feel that the way to move forward is to deny the negative beliefs and thereby eliminate them. You have created a reality that contains both positive and negative. You contain both. It is not a matter of ever escaping the negative. It is part of you. The negative will always be there. It is a polarized expression of the reality itself.

If you want to move forward, acknowledge and allow the negative to exist, but make your intention be to see and choose the positive perspective. The negative then becomes irrelevant to the experience of your life. You will still be aware of it, but you will no longer experience one drop of the negative from it.

You will continue to be aware of negativity because your world contains negativity, but this will only be in the others in your reality. In other words, you may be more aware of “negative things” happening to other individuals.

From your perspective, you will understand that it is not something negative that is happening to them. They are interpreting it as negative, denying it, and therefore creating the negative experience. Therefore, you might still perceive negativity but not experience it at all.

Thoughts You Act On

Often people discuss how “thoughts create things,” but it is not thoughts in and of themselves that create things; it is the action you take based upon those thoughts. You can think anything you wish. When you think of something positive, you don’t create a positive reality. When you think of something negative, you don’t create a negative reality.

Thinking is simply the library. You can read any book you wish: scary, happy, angry, sad, miserable, or ecstatic. You can read them all. But the ones you check out by acting on them are the ones that are your life.

It is the actions you take and the books, to continue the analogy, you have read as a manual for those actions that determine the reality. If you do not act with a negative perspective, you can never...

“Did he say never?”

“I think he did,”

...never get a negative experience.

You can only experience a negative experience if you first interpret it that way, assign that meaning, and then act with that interpretation and negative attitude. Then, yes, you may experience things that you will find very easy to label negative.

But it also works the other way around. If you label things in a positive way, all your creations, you also change the rate and flow of time. You can have more preferred manifestations.

Therefore, it's “about time” that you, perhaps, begin to look, invite, and embrace anything that you have denied. All these things are ideas or symbols within you, none of which can destroy you, none of which can have any negative effect on you, no matter how overwhelmingly negative they seem, if you simply choose to assume and maintain the positive perspective. You created it all. The sooner you accept this, the sooner you can transform your experience.

When You're Struggling

As you apply what we discuss and decide to create a positive life, you may find that you are still functioning from the seemingly old negative perspective. First of all, that's all right. You are simply having an attitude. You are simply having an interpretation. If you stop at that point and do not act, you can mull things over as long as you wish.

If this happens, our suggestion is that you pause before you act. Roll this around as much as you want. You can cry. You can be miserable. You can fully explore the negative perspective of "this is happening to me." However, before you act, provide one positive alternative.

Use your imagination to find better ways to act. Your imagination is a specifically aligned "tool" just for you that you can never lose. Imagine the preferred you, state the belief of that preferred you, and feel how it feels.

This is not the negative old you but the new preferred you. When you feel that negative feeling, then in your imagination, hand the situation over to the new preferred you. See how that new preferred you handles it. See what they do. See how they act. Then you have two choices: the automatic negative choice, but also now having emotionally reattached and resummoned up your referential preferential you, two sets of actions.

We suggest that if you lay both sets of these actions down on the table, you will, every time, have no difficulty in choosing the actions of the preferred you. It will be so obvious that those actions are more representative of who you choose to be. You get to be who you choose to be if you say so.

When an old tendency seems to come along, rather than saying, "There I go again! Oh! I have failed! All my metaphysical training down the drain,” you can simply substitute these two words: “So what? So what? Here is one idea. It is not an idea that I prefer; therefore, I need not judge myself for having come up with it. Presenting as many options as I will, gives me that many more choices. So what? I thought that. Big deal. Now, I will summon the referential preferential me. I will now see how that me would act. I will lay them side by side. If the miserable alternative looks more appealing, I can still do it. I haven’t lost it, but now I will be acting as a creator and have used the fact that I have that ‘tendency’ to my advantage.”

When we say, “Use your creations,” we mean all of them. This even includes self-invalidation and judgment. Those paralyze you and “nip your ability in the bud,” so to speak, to do anything about it.

Instead of saying, “Oh! Dumb me,” say, “So what? Is this what I intend to do? Is this representative of who I am now? No.”

It will be obvious to you that it has been of service to you. It will remind you in no uncertain terms of who you prefer to be, perhaps, by giving you an example of who you do not prefer to be. That is one way to do it. And you can use that as well.

Denial Creates Space and Time

As you start to pay attention and allow yourself to be honest about the many ways in which you have denied your reality and, therefore, created separations and kept things from yourself, have a good time. You can literally start right now to have a good time.

When you assume that you must do “this, this, and that” before you will be where you wish to be and have life going the way you want, you create time and distance between yourself and the things you desire. This is because, basically, what you are saying is that right here and right now is not the most perfect place and time, and therefore, physical reality reflects that.

You can simply be that right now, one unit, no space, and therefore, there is not the necessity for time. You can decide that right here and right now is the most perfect place.

When you exist, you exist right now, and never was there a moment in your life when you would not or could not say, “It is right now.” That one moment is the spark itself.

When you think about the past from the present, you create separation. The further back that separation is in your estimation, the more time you need to create in order to walk all those steps.

The present doesn’t need to be a result of the past. The past is recreated in the present each time you think about it. The moment you let go of the past, you let go of where you will be, which is not where you are, changing your perception of time. That is because these things create separations from being right here and right now and create space and time. Ultimately this separation reflects in a physical world in which things are kept from you.

Decide to Be Right Here, Right Now

All you need to do is to decide, “Right now, I am who I prefer to be, right now.” From this point forward, when something comes up that seems to be a representation of an older un-preferred version of you, look at some of the things that we have shared.

You will find that it will come in handy, and from this moment forward, you will become who you wish to be. Simply decide. Be who you wish to be right now, which is the only time there is. When you decide you are not who you wish to be, your physical reality reflects this and appears imperfect.

You Create Symbols as an Excuse

This is the transformational age, and many, many, many individuals will begin to see their power, will begin to understand that they function from the moment, and because they do not understand this consciously, will force themselves to let go of that past. As an example, let’s suppose there is a severe weather storm. Afterward, while there was some destruction, few people were injured or killed.

In “the rubble” of what has occurred, they might have lost personal items, such as mementos and nostalgic material. These personal items are the museums of the lives of those individuals who gave them very strong identifications with their past.

Many individuals, simultaneously, thousands, in fact, have unconsciously chosen to force themselves through these types of symbols to literally obliterate their past. Although from the general perspective of your society, it may seem like a “bummer,” it will have the overall effect of allowing those individuals to start over. Letting go of these past ideas, which literally bind you, is very liberating.

As you let go of the past by understanding that your past has been a recreation from the present of that past, and not even generally a precise recreation, by the way, you give yourself the opportunity to be right here, right now, with no distractions, and no self-imposed separations. Physical reality will ultimately reflect this.

If, from this point forward, which is the only point there is, you consciously let go of the past as an excuse, you will then not need to force yourself through a symbol to do so. If you do this, and many of you have, we are not taking away from that, but if you continue to do so, you will then not need the symbol to force it on yourself.

When you understand that physical reality is a symbolic representation of what you believe, you can simply “get down to it” without needing to create the symbol to force you to do so.

Denial and Disease

This is true with everything in your closet. The loudest knocking comes from the things you deny the most, and they build up enough momentum to force their way to your conscious awareness. If you really deny something, you cut yourself off from yourself. You are denying yourself. This manifests in what you call “disease.” “Disease” is a symbol that forces you to look at a certain idea or die.

You can choose to look at the idea in lieu of dying. The more you acknowledge what you believe, the less of a tendency you will have to create disease. All disease is the result of not being an aligned whole being.

Living in Joy

Needless to say, when you chop up portions of your conscious awareness and tuck them into different compartments, this is not integrated. It's up to you. It always will be. Recollect this material and yourself out of choice and reference because you say so, because you know you can only grow and learn, and because you know when that closet is empty, you will be living in ecstatic joy.

We assume that this is attractive to you, and so we share it as an option. We never insist that what we are saying is better than what you are doing. But if you choose to find that you are in synchronous alignment with what we are sharing, please take it. Please use it. It is an option and will have the effect that we are sharing, should you choose to do it, and it's up to you.

Conclusion

We thank you for opening the many doors that you create between the sections of your consciousness and within your reality. We thank you for your willingness to interact with us as equals. That equalization is all that is necessary to gather and recollect yourself.

We thank you for understanding that the concepts you have denied are equal to all other concepts, and then it becomes a matter of preference: “Do I prefer it,” and not a matter of “this is better than that, and everyone knows that.” That is separation and judgment. The unequal assignment of weight is separation. You integrate and manifest a preferable reality when you validate the world, see everything as equally valid, and acknowledge it. You can decide that you prefer something but not by invalidating the symbols you do not. Life happens through you, not to you.

Does the Law of Attraction Work?

When people hear about things like the Law of Attraction and the metaphysical and spiritual ideas like what we speak about, they often say patronizingly, “nice philosophy.” You can obviously look at it that way if you want. However, on our planet, within our civilization, within our reality, this is far more than a philosophy. To us, it is actually mechanics and physics.

When you start to understand that when you change your choices, you can change your reality, you will see that this is far more than a “philosophy.”

Now, you may say, “Nice philosophy, but how does it really relate to our real lives down here?”

First, understand that these ideas are mainstream within our society. This is how we approach creating reality. We can tell you they are real, they are mechanical, and they are physics. They are far more than a philosophy.

It is always your choice whether you want to apply these principles or not.

Your purpose here is to explore and find out what is “all that is,” what is God. In actuality, the question is “who are you” because you are “all that is.” The key to figuring this out is to pay attention to what excites you.

Excitement Can Transform Your Life

From a technical point of view, excitement is your way to tune into and discover more of who you are. Excitement is an energy you can use to transform your life from one that you may have been living unconsciously with negativity to one that you are living consciously with positivity.

Choices Change Reality

Overall at this point in time, you are at somewhat of a crossover point in which you can take the negative things and turn them into positive things. You deserve to exist and have a life in which you get what you want. When you change your choices, you will find that positive synchronicity replaces negative synchronicity. The things you don’t want, if you relabel them, will disappear from your reality. By relabeling, we mean that you are the one deciding that negative things are negative. If you can figure out how to relabel those things as positive, you will change your reality.

As we have said, and will continue to say, time and time again, and each time for the first time, you can only experience a reality that you are the vibration of. Many of you have the vibration of being someone that manifests a reality that you don't prefer.

Take Action

In order to change your life, however, you need to take action. This is very nicely stated as “fake it ‘til you make it.” That is not being insincere or inauthentic. When you “act as if,” you are using mechanics to change your vibration.

For example, you often believe that life contains a certain number of things that you don't like and a certain amount that you do. As a result, you act in a certain way. This perpetuates that vibration. This perpetuates your reality.

The important thing here is that simply wanting to create a life that you prefer, that is ecstatic, joyful, and everything that you desire, in and of itself, is not enough to change your vibration. It's a start, though, and after all, you do have beginnings and endings within your linear time frame. What will physically raise your vibration, however, is physical action, and the tone that physical action takes is determined by your fundamental beliefs. So, in other words, you need to understand what your fundamental beliefs are in order for that action to be effective.

Own Your Reality

This all comes back to the way you view your reality. When you look around you and decide that some things should exist and others should not, you are not acting like an owner. You created all of these things. Nothing is extraneous.

You are not an extraneous creator, just as “all that is” is not an extraneous creator.

If you want to be an owner and effectively change your reality, then you need to act like an owner. To act like an owner, start relabeling the things in your life that you do not prefer as “something which obviously must be here for a reason” because you would not create for no reason. When you do that, you, in effect, assume the attitude of an owner, and that will result in different actions. The attitude of “owning your reality” is what allows you to take different actions and allows you to transform it.

Overall, this is what we are trying to tell you. When you move forward in this way, your vibration, and believe me when I say this if you do, changes. It changes to the vibration of a person who only creates what he prefers, and therefore you cannot, cannot, attract a reality you do not prefer. It will disappear from your life. There will be nothing left to relabel.

Choose the Most Exciting Option

Here is how you can prove this to yourselves. If you decide that you will do 60% of what excites you, you will have a 60% preferential life. You will still have the other 40% in there. That’s how it works. The degree of your trust results in the degree of change in your action, which results in the degree of change in your reality.

In other words, at any given time, all you need to do to totally change your reality to one of ecstatic joy is to look at what choices you have immediately in front of you and choose the one that is most exciting. That is your arrow. That is your barometer.

It Is Effortless

Something that we say over and over again is that it is that simple. It is effortless. All that you have to do is to decide right now because that is the only time there is, after all, that you will only do that which excites from the choices you have. And do you know what happens when you do that? You start having a good time right now. That changes your vibration. That does not allow the things that you do not prefer to exist within your reality.

This is how we live our lives all the time. You can choose. The fact that you can understand this and that we can communicate with you is your proof that it is within your grasp, your reach, your realm, your plane, and your density. That is why we are able to co-create and share with you in this manner. And besides, it's a lot of fun!

You Exist on Many Levels

As a multidimensional being, you exist on many more levels than the you in this physical reality. While we enjoy interacting with you on this level, we also enjoy interacting with you on any level that we can interact with you. After all, you exist on all levels simultaneously right now. From your physical perspective and your fine focus here, you may not be consciously aware of this; nevertheless, it is true.

We exist on a level that we call “4th density.” This means that while we are physical beings, we also embrace our non-physical side as well. Your society is actually becoming more aware of its 4th density existence as well. This is the transformation that your society is going through right now. You are still an individual. You are still physical. But you can understand that there are simultaneous existences. You are more willing to accept that idea and, therefore, to have access to them. The point is that, on some level, you chose to be here in this physical reality. On some level, you made a choice to be focused in this way. Reassume that responsibility and stop denying your reality. That is the key.

You Can Choose to Deny This

Now, you can say, as many do, “This stuff doesn’t work! There are plenty of things in my life that I don’t like, and I did not put them there.” When you do that, you are not acting like an owner. Instead, you are choosing to perpetuate separation. Separation is the idea that you exist within a reality and that things within your reality are separate from you and not controlled by you. You are failing to see that you created it all, and that is all you. When you see yourself as being detached and separate, you miss out on the opportunity to grow, and you miss out on the ability to take back your power. You are a victim, and you will only continue to lead a life that you don’t like.

Transformation

As humans, you are the masters of limitation. You love seeing how you don't have power. In fact, you have mastered that idea. You have played it out in every way, shape, and form you can within this reality. You are always welcome to do whatever you want. However, at this point, you have done it all. Why not consider transformation?

What we are presenting is something that works very well for us in our society. The truth is that even before we "clicked" into these ideas and experienced our transformation, we were a bit more innately "piped in" than you. We inherently, from the start, on a higher consciousness level, chose less limitation than you. However, the fact that you can perceive us and understand what we are saying shows that you are ready.

Validation

One of the things that comes up a lot in your society, especially in social media, is the need for validation. You want to be validated. You want to be heard. You want to be noticed. You want to be liked.

Validation, however, is a two-sided coin. To understand this, you first have to understand what the universal truth is. The universal truth is composed of all truths. If you leave one out, it is not the universal truth. Different people can believe things as true that seem contradictory. This does not make them less true for the people believing them.

The key to validation is to understand that those truths are true for others, regardless if they are true for you. When you can accept that they are true for others without invalidating them, you are validating yourself. By validating the truths of others, you are saying that your truth is so powerful that you can allow other truths within it. You don't need someone else to agree with you for your truth to be valid. Their truth is valid, just not what you prefer. The more you validate the truths of others, the more you validate yourself.

We see that you want to be validated. You are, however, approaching it somewhat backward. Others are an extension of you. Once you validate others, you will receive external validation because your validation of others is all one thing. Allow the universe, which is also you, to validate you back.

This is somewhat of a game, a game of perspective. One way to feel validated and feel the things you believe have validation is to validate.

Your Validation Affects the Universe

As both individuals and a society, your vibrations are rising. We see it. When you validate, your validation ripples out into your world to be felt by all on some level whether they realize it or not. You do make a difference to each and every person in your reality.

One way to think about this is like dropping a stone into a pond. Initially, there is a small ripple around where the stone hits the water. This ripple expands in a widening circle, growing and growing until, eventually, it reaches the furthest edges of the pond. It expands, it amplifies, and it grows.

This is a very good analogy for the impact that a change in your vibration will make not only on you, not only on your planet but on the entire universe. We think that's really exciting!

We are excited about it. We like to feel your ripples. Please keep tossing your stones into the pond. We enjoy them greatly. By the time they "reach us," colloquially speaking, they are quite big, quite strong, and quite exciting. We enjoy experiencing this reality with you, and it is exciting all the time.

Within this reality, we only experience the positive. What you consider to be negativity doesn't touch us. We say this to remind you that it's possible to have a life that is only positive. We are proof. However, you do have to believe that you deserve it. From our perspective, whether or not you do perceive that you deserve this, you do.

What is fascinating is that "all that is" is so unconditionally loving and accepting of you that if you feel you do not deserve to have a great life, it will allow you to have a miserable life. I know this may sound strange, but that is unconditional love: the ability to allow any manifestation. You are loved regardless of the condition of you loving yourself. Anything you create is a perfect manifestation. If you want to create perfect misery, you get perfect misery.

It Can Be Simple

Everything we are saying often comes to the idea that creating a life that you love can be simple. It's your choice. We are providing a simple alternative.

What is odd is that sometimes the fact that it is simple, is too hard for you to accept. Simplicity itself is a barrier, and you want to insist that it must be hard or difficult. Okay, you can have it that way if you want. But if you want to accept that it can be simple, it can be.

Now, we are not saying the universe is not complex; it definitely can be, and you can make things very complex. However, that's a choice. Another choice is that things can be simple.

The Details

The next thing we want to talk about is the details. We notice that when you are trying to figure out how to get what you want, you and your society put a lot of emphasis on trying to figure out the details. You know what you want, and then you put all these rules and details in place as to how it must happen. You decide that "It must occur in this particular way, or I will not believe it is happening."

Alright. You can have it that way if you want, but it does not have to be that way. It doesn't have to be difficult, and you don't need to figure out how. It can be effortless.

The Path of Least Resistance

Trying to figure things out and focusing on the details can really slow you down. This is because you do not have the ability analytically to take into consideration all the parameters. Your physical body is simply not capable of figuring it out.

In most cases, the path you think it will or should take is way off. It's not even close! You spend a lot of time going in the wrong direction. Everything occurs most easily along the path of least resistance. This is the path everything takes. In fact, it's almost a sub-law of your particular reality; however, we use the word "law" loosely.

Excitement Is the Least Resistance

We have been applying these principles for a long time, and throughout our society, so we have a lot of experience. Our suggestion is to first be clear about what you want in a vague fashion. All you need to do is to be aware of it. Then in any situation and at any moment in time, simply pay attention to what excites you and that you can do something about, and then do it. Excitement is your path of least resistance. As a bonus, you then get to have a lot of fun while the details take care of themselves.

Details Can Hold You Back

Trying to figure out the details or paying attention to the details can really hold you back because then you fail to see what's in front of you. Of course, it can happen the way you think it is supposed to happen, but generally, it takes a lot of time.

One thing that we notice is that sometimes you are so anxious to get what you want that you go about it in a paradoxical manner. Rather than be excited now, you decide that you cannot be excited until you have the thing you want, and you put yourself on an uncomfortable path. We say this to perhaps give you another way of looking at it.

It Is Easy

It doesn't take much. Remember, a minuscule, a minuscule, very small change, in your perspective, very small, makes a great sweeping change within your reality. This is true in both what you have labeled "your future," which is actually being created from the present, and "your past," which is also being created from the present. A small change makes a grand sweeping change. It is that easy.

100% Guarantee of Success

That's it. To sum all of this up, validate, accept, be clear with your intention, and let the details take care of themselves. If you do that, I assure you, and in fact, I guarantee you 100%, and how often do you get that kind of guarantee on your planet? However, you are the only one who can prove it. You are the only one who can put it into action and can begin to have a good time, that is, if you want to have a good time.

You Can Let Go of Your Limitations

We will say this again because it is something that really fascinates us about humans. You are insistent, insistent on holding on to your limitations and your separations while at the same time claiming to wish to transcend them. You say you want to be free but act like you're not. This is a paradox to us. At the same, we do understand because it comes from your perspective, which is that “the past results in the present.” You can choose to let go of this idea by saying that “the present is not a result of the past.” You, in a very real sense, can cut off the shackles that you complain about.

The Keys

Okay, that’s it. We have “given you the keys.” It is up to you if you want to drive the car. It’s your choice. We suggest you take a little ride around the block. See how the view is. See how comfortable the ride is. Ultimately though, enjoy yourself. Say “Hello” to your neighbors and have a good time.

How to Use Vibrations to Your Advantage

As people learn more about the principles we teach, a word that is used a lot is vibration. However, many people are not exactly sure what this means and why it is important. This is what we want to explain. When you understand what a vibration is, you can use vibrations constructively.

What allows people, events, and things to appear different from one another is that they all have different vibrations. You may view God, or “all that is,” as the primary vibration of existence. “All that is” is one homogeneous substance. “All that is” differentiates itself by attenuating, changing, and distorting vibrations. Even your scientists understand that you only perceive a small bandwidth of the overall frequency of creation.

Example: Colors = Varying Vibrations

There are different colors of light, and this is because they have different vibrations. The slower vibrating, longer wavelengths of visible light are red. The higher frequency, shorter wavelengths of light are violet. The reason you can see these different colors, such as red, orange, green, yellow, green-blue, and indigo-violet, is because they have different frequencies and vibrations.

More Than You Can Detect

Currently, when you measure vibration on your planet, you are only capable of measuring a minute portion and a small bandwidth of the overall totality of the vibration of creation. Electromagnetic frequencies are one of the vibrations you understand the best, but they only occupy a mere slice of the entire spectrum. Your measuring devices, at least up until now, are generally electromagnetic. In other words, you can only measure a limited amount of frequencies and a minor portion of the overall vibration.

Your Signature Vibration

Just like light, each and every one of you is a particular vibration. You are each a particular frequency. We like to call that portion of your vibration that remains the same and allows you to have a sense of identity your “signature vibration.” As you grow, live different lives, and expand, you have some sense of having the same identity. That’s because that vibration, that signature vibration, in a sense, remains constant. That is what distinguishes you as an individual. Each and every different individual has a different vibration, a different frequency.

Transcendental Vibrations

There is one type of vibration that is very loose and can easily be tuned to any other vibration, and that is called a transcendental vibration. “Love” or, in particular, “unconditional love” is a transcendental vibration. When you accept and appreciate any aspect of creation and “unconditionally love it,” so to speak, you actually harmonically resonate and tune to its vibration.

When you express unconditional love, you are being empathic and sympathetic (not meaning to feel sorry for) to whatever you are loving. Unconditional love is a transcendental attuning vibration. We will show you why this is very useful.

Use Them to Find Solutions

You have in your society a saying, “to know them is to love them.” We propose that “to love them is to know them” because love tunes your frequency, literally, to the thing you are loving.

If you want to find a positive solution to any situation, approach it with unconditional love, acceptance, and openness. That will literally tune you to the specifics and focus you in such a way that you can find the best solutions. This applies to not only situations but also other people. If you love them first, you then allow yourself to see them more clearly. You attracted these people into your life for a reason and to serve you in some way. When you let go and are open, you can use unconditional love to see why.

Remember, everything is fundamentally neutral, blank. You are the one who decides what something means and what value it has. If you look at something as being negative, I assure you, you will get a negative effect.

But, if you approach it with unconditional love, you will tune yourself to that situation, and you will allow yourself to vibrate sympathetically with that vibration. That changes your perception. You can then see the situation through new eyes, unconditionally loving eyes. Those eyes will be very creative eyes, and they will allow you to always see the positive in any given neutral situation.

You Have a Habit of Being Negative

You have in your society, and we do not mean this derogatorily, become masters in a neutral situation at seeing the negative. You're very good at this. You have become accustomed to it; however, it is by no means a law of creation. It's just a habit.

You Can Change Your Habit

When you are aware of a habit, you no longer have the habit; it is then a choice. If you keep consciously labeling things as negative, you will keep perpetuating them. That's a habit that you are perpetuating. You're the one who is making those things negative by labeling them negative and then tuning into the negative side of it.

You Can Change Your Life

All things are neutral and have the potential to be positive or negative. Because of your habit, it may be more obvious what is negative in any given situation; however, you can be a bit more creative and allow yourself to see the positive aspects. When you do, the negative things will change. When you own and use all your creations in a positive way, you will no longer create a reality that needs to be relabeled. You will no longer create a reality that seems miserable. Remember, physical reality consists of symbols, and those negative symbols will disappear from your life. It's that easy.

Good Vibes

Unconditionally loving someone enables you to see their "good vibes." Very literally, in your society, when you speak about getting a "good vibe" from a particular individual, it is this alignment of vibrations.

You have an electromagnetic vibrational sense of discernment and can sense the vibration of others. If you sense that their vibration does not mesh with yours, you will, in general, give it a negative label. "That person is very bad. I do not like them." But if you synchronize your vibration with who you really are, then you will get a good vibe.

Beliefs Are Vibrations

Everything is vibration. This even includes beliefs. Your primary beliefs are vibrations, just like everything else. Although from your physical point of view, they may seem more ethereal.

Vibrations Attract Similar Vibrations

Remember, you can only experience a reality that you are the vibration of. Even though you have the saying that “opposites attract,” you only attract something to you, which is of like vibration to that which you are exploring.

Beliefs Filter Vibrations

Your beliefs are vibrations that very literally act as filters. For instance, when you have a particular limiting belief, you will only see through the vibration of that belief and, therefore, will only be looking for evidence that that belief is true. That will blind you and lock your vision out of 99.9% of the other options around you.

Choose New Beliefs and Act on Them

When you nail down your limiting beliefs, you transform your reality “from the ground up.” You can stop perpetuating them. You can decide on new beliefs. You can then state those new beliefs and feel them with all the emotion you can muster. Feel how truly having that new belief allows you to feel. Then, and here is the most important part, act as though you are a person who already believes that. This is the most important thing in manifesting in this reality.

With that action, you will be the vibration of that person. What determines your most outwardly visible vibration to others will never be your beliefs or your thoughts, although sometimes maybe your emotions, but what is most visible in your reality, both between others and yourself, and “all that is” and yourself, are your actions. Actions are the ultimate manifestations of your vibration. When you act as though you believe something, this “speaks louder than words.”

The only reason you experience any limiting beliefs is because you act as though you believe them. It doesn't even matter if they don't serve you in any way. When you decide what you want your new beliefs to be and act that way, you are not pretending or fooling yourself into believing something.

Consciously Recognize Your Beliefs

In general, you unconsciously act according to your limiting beliefs. What we are suggesting is to be conscious of what you want your beliefs to be and then act according to them. You are then being a conscious creator of your reality and not an unconscious one.

When you create unconsciously, your reality seems as though it is happening to you. It seems as though you are within it and that you are trapped. On the other hand, when you create consciously, you then experience reality as happening from you.

Tune into Good Vibes

In any given moment, if you tune into the “good vibe,” you will find that no matter what, no matter what, even if it is one of the things that you might typically label negative, that still does not make it inherently bad. One way to start is to allow yourself to accept what that particular thing has allowed you to do that you would not have done otherwise.

You create your reality 100% all the time, no matter what you believe. If you believe you do not, you experience the effect of not creating your reality. The paradox is that you are creating that. You are always creating, and you can always, when you decide at your own leisure, nobody will let you to have too much fun, take back your creator hood in any given moment. It is that easy.

Conclusion

Thank you for sharing your vibrations with us. We constantly marvel at the many expressive ways in which “all that is” chooses to experience and discover itself. We are enriched beyond measure to have the opportunity to interact with you and your society. Although you are very focused in your chosen reality, and it seems very solid, that does not make you any less spiritual.

All physicality is an expression of spirituality. Do not deny what you have chosen to experience. If you do, you will not take advantage of what is right in front of you. You will constantly be denying that you have created it to begin with. If you appreciate that you have chosen it, you will act that way, and then you will give yourself the opportunity to see why.

The Core of Change: Decision

This is one of our favorite chapters because it describes one of the most important concepts when it comes to creating your reality: decision. One of the most confusing things for people who study the types of things that we discuss and the Law of Attraction is that they have had the experience of thinking about certain things they want and yet those things don't manifest. Why? Do thoughts create things? Where does your power lie?

One thing that you always have control over is the decisions that you make. This is useful and important because you are always making a decision. You are deciding that some things are good and some things are bad. You are deciding you will act this way and not that way. You are deciding you are this type of person and not that type of person. You are always deciding.

When you really understand the power of decision, you will see that you can change your life instantly. That's exciting.

In order to fully grasp the depth of this power, you first have to understand that you already contain anything that you seek to know, anything that you seek to experience, and anything that you seek to create. I can say this because, as a physical being myself, I understand your nature as a being. Each and every one of you is multidimensional infinite and eternal by nature.

You cannot think about anything that you are not. You can think about an infinite number of things; therefore, you must be infinite. You can think about what it's like to be successful. You can only define that you are or are not successful if you already understand what it means to be successful. Otherwise, how would you know whether you are or are not? Maybe you feel like having an overflow of money would be amazing. You could only imagine that if you already understood what it means to be abundantly wealthy. The fact that you can think about something is your proof that you already have it.

Maybe you can understand that. You might then wonder why, if you can imagine these things, they are not present in your physical reality. That's what we will talk about in this chapter.

You Create Reality

The physical reality that you are experiencing right here and right now is a small limited part of who you are. You created this reality on purpose and with limitations. While you may not be consciously aware of this, it must be true; otherwise, you could not think about no limits. Linear physical reality is limited. That means that it contains things like space and time. Finite and limited reality means that things have to have a beginning, a middle, and an ending. The concepts of “before, during, and after” are some of the sub-characteristics of linear reality.

Being limited has advantages. At times, you may have a hard time believing that, but that’s only because you are deciding that it’s not an advantage. Being limited means that you are not aware that you are indeed multidimensional, infinite, and eternal.

Being physical allows you to experience things in a gradient fashion. Essentially you forget that you are multidimensional, infinite, and eternal so that you can experience the idea of growth. What this means is that rather than manifesting everything instantly, you instead create in steps, in graduations, or using a process. You have the experience of moving forward and growing.

While it may seem like you exist within a reality, the truth is that this physical reality exists within you. Your current perspective is a limited point of view that you created intentionally.

Everything that you experience is contained within the infinity of your consciousness. You contain it all. From your infinite point of view, there is no “within” and “without.” Those are linear terms. Your body is literally within your consciousness and not the other way around.

You already contain it all: all knowledge, all experience, and all ideas. While it may appear that there is “stuff out there,” you already have it all. What you perceive as growth and learning are some of the characteristics of linear reality. From your infinite point of view, it is an illusion.

You already know it all. The idea of not knowing something and then learning about it is an apparency. You create the apparency of learning. Everything in physical reality is actually a symbol of a mental concept. Learning, for example, represents expressing more of yourself, embracing your power, your infinite potential, and what you know to be true for you. Anything that rings true with you, anything that feels true at any given moment, you already contained to begin with.

Expressing More of Who You Are

When you come to terms with the fact that you are pure consciousness and an infinite being, you then understand that you set up this reality on purpose. You did it in such a way so that you could experience the process of attracting resources, information, and timings that allow you to express more and more and more and more of who you already are. Life is not about becoming something that you are not. Instead, it is about allowing yourself to express more of who you already are.

You Have Chosen Limitation

Another way of looking at this is that you express yourself in physical terms as a very contracted vibration. It's like being pure white light, which contains all colors, an infinity of colors, and then choosing to play with the idea of being just a particular color of red. When you do this, you then get to experience forgetting 99.99999% and so on and so forth of who you are. You can really focus on the infinitesimal decimal place 0.1% of who you now choose to express yourself as.

Your vibration, in a physical sense, is contracted. When you expand and accept who you are, your vibrational resonance rises. It's like experiencing more and more of the color and colors of who you are. You sometimes refer to this as your vibration ascending. However, ascension is expressing more of who you already are and is not somewhere to go to from here.

Ascending Is Being More

While it may seem like there is a here and a there, both here and there exist within you. From your physical perspective, here seems separate from there. In the totality of who you are, there is no separation. Ascending is being more of yourself.

Something we want to point out about ascension is that when people talk about ascension, what they often mean is ascending away from this physical reality. Ascension is seen as some form of escape or liberation. However, that is only one way to look at it.

We like to think about it as the fact that you, in no uncertain terms, have chosen to be here. You have chosen to be here to experience yourself in a very specific way, within this reality, with very specific parameters. You wanted to be here, and you wanted to experience this life.

Being Limited Has Advantages

There are very unique advantages to being physical. If you think about it, if you were all-knowing, all-seeing, and simultaneous, life would not be the same. For example, you couldn't learn, you couldn't grow, and you couldn't be surprised. You couldn't have that first-time experience, or hope, or expectation. All of these things are irrelevant when you already know it all. So, in other words, physical reality allows you to discover, be surprised, and experience unexpected outcomes.

Ascension Means Consciously Creating

One way to describe ascension is actively participating in the creation and experience of your reality consciously because you say so. Very literally, if you were to ascribe levels to ascension, the first level of ascension would be ascending into living this reality fully, with absolutely no nuance, no hint of the idea of escaping from this reality. You would not be trying to “ascend away from this awful place,” as you sometimes refer to it.

The idea of ascending, or expanding your vibration, is a joyful celebration of more of who you already are, and you don't need to give anything up to become more of who you already are. Since you contain it all, there is no outside. There is nothing really external. There is nothing but you experiencing yourself. You cannot really escape from yourself because all you would be doing is going to yourself anyway.

When you really let this sink in, you will see in no uncertain terms that there is nowhere to go. When you think about things that you lack, you can understand that you're already there. You're the one creating the separation between where you are and where you want to be. At first, you may not understand why you are doing that, but at least you can understand that you are.

If you decide that you are already there, you then can experience the advantages of what you have already, in no uncertain terms, created as your reality. You created this experience, and you created this reality on purpose.

This is where we tie this all together and bring it back to the importance of deciding. That's because one way you can change your reality is to dive in and decide what you want your reality to be in any given moment. It's all happening right here and right now.

Remember that you limit yourself or gradiently express your consciousness from the infinite being you actually are. You have limited yourself on purpose. Mechanically this happens through your beliefs. Your beliefs limit you. Those beliefs, in turn, create emotions and thoughts, and those ultimately result in action. Your beliefs are a mechanism that you created to limit yourself. The power of that is that you can choose new beliefs.

It's Your Decision

This is where the difference between having a belief and having it expressed in your physical reality comes in. This is why some things exist in your physical reality, and some things don't. The paradox is that though your reality is the result of your beliefs, emotions, thoughts, and actions, you do not have one belief and do not have another.

As people start to understand things like the Law of Attraction, people often think that in order to change their reality, they must get rid of their unpreferred beliefs. Let me state upfront that's not possible. As I said, you contain it all. You contain all beliefs. For every belief that you can think of, you also have the opposite.

For example, if you see someone you admire as being confident, you contain the idea of confidence. Otherwise, how would you know they are confident? And simultaneously, you also understand what it means to be not confident or insecure. You obviously know what confidence means and how a person with confidence behaves, so you contain all that as well.

I mention this distinction not to confuse you, not to annoy you, nor to make things complex. I do it to point out that if you understand that you already contain it all, then there is nothing to get rid of or process through. There is nothing to gain or achieve. It all boils down to one word: "decision."

In every moment, you have the choice of being who you prefer to be versus who someone else says you should be, who you think you should be out of obligation to everyone else, or whatever your rationale is for being someone that does not experience and express joy in their life.

You Don't Need to Earn Anything

Your birthright is joy. Your birthright is ecstasy. You don't need to earn these things. Now, you may decide, and many of you do, that you must earn them, but you are the ultimate dictator of your reality. You and only you can decide, "Well, alright. I could experience ecstasy. I could experience joy. Once I earn them, I can experience them too!"

You contain it all. You can use that approach if you want. When you do that, you create the experience of not deserving joy, needing to take a series of steps or actions so that you can then actually experience it.

The interesting point is that it is not the process of earning it that creates joy in your life. It's the moment you finally decide that you have earned the right to express your joy and actually allow yourself to experience it that creates the experience. It is not the process of having earned it that creates it, nor the "dues" that you have paid as an excuse. All of that criteria and baggage are set up by you and you alone.

You Are Always Deciding

In every moment, you are always being some version of who you believe yourself to be. In every moment, you decide who you are. You create who you are 100% fully in each and every moment right now, right now, right now, right now, and right now.

Now is the only time that is truly, truly real. Your infinite consciousness is one eternal simultaneous now. You create the illusion of a linear progression of “nows.” In each of those “nows,” which, by the way, are all truly the same now, you make a decision: “I am this person. I am this person. I am this way. I am that way.”

You generally do so through some elaborate set of criteria. Perhaps you say, “I am this person because this happened when I was a child.” Perhaps you say, “I am this person because these things would only happen to a person such as this.” Perhaps you say, “I am this person because everyone tells me I am; therefore, they must be onto something.”

But ultimately, it is your decision. It is your agreement with whatever that criteria may be, “I am this person,” that allows you to express from all the possibilities that you contain, that version, that person that you are being in that moment.

At first, the idea that you can change your life completely and instantly at any given moment by deciding that it is so sounds ridiculous because so much of life seems to stay the same regardless of how you think. The reason that you experience yourself as a linear being rather than a completely new person with a different body, different hair color, different eye color, different height, and different weight in any moment is because as you define yourself in any given “now” moment, you bring along the baggage. You bring along the idea of who you are.

You might say, “Well, I am this person who is exactly the same person that I was a moment ago with this one minor little difference.” And of course, you will experience the result of that one minor little difference with the apparency of being the same person.

We do not share this so that you will spontaneously disintegrate your entire personality and completely transform this reality into an unrecognizable form—that is an option, by the way. You don’t need to do that in order to recreate yourself according to your preference in any given moment.

Be Mindful of Your Decisions

If you pay attention to the decisions you are making right now and then dialogue with yourself to determine who you would prefer to be right now, you can completely and 100% transform your entire experience right now.

You are always making decisions anyway. I am not suggesting or introducing anything you are not an expert at. We sometimes say, “You are perfect creators.” So, when you create misery, it is perfect misery. When you create joy, it is perfect joy. But it always hinges on the decision in the moment of who you are.

Decision, Trust, and Action

Here is how decision is the foundation of your reality. Reality is created in these three steps:

1. You make a decision about who you are: “This is who I am.” That is your foundation. This is the core of your identity.
2. You trust that decision: “Well, I must be that person,” even when reality may suggest otherwise.
3. You take action in your reality consistent with the foundation of who you decided you are: “This is who I am.” Actions are ultimately what makes those decisions stick. Actions activate who you are. Actions make it official.

Whatever you decide you get, regardless of whatever method you use as an excuse to make that decision, the decision still sticks. It is important to understand that while the decision is important, it is the actions that make it so. There’s a difference between thinking something and being something.

This is why you can think so many things and not have them exist in your reality. You are not acting as if you believe in them. It’s your beliefs followed by your actions that transition the thoughts from the mental plane to the physical plane, and that happens through decision.

The Past Doesn’t Define You

As an example, people will sometimes assume that “In order to be the person I want to be, I must understand who I am already being,” and often they will create an elaborate process and drama around trying to figure out “Why, oh why, am I who I am?”

The interesting thing is, is that when you try to figure out who you already are, you continually reestablish the decision, “This is who I am.” When you dig into your past to figure out why you “turned out to be such a messed up person with a lot of issues,” you continually reassert who you are. You continually maintain the decision that “I am this person that needs so much work.”

Decide Who You Want to Be

If you like growing gradually, then figuring these things out can be fun. On the other hand, if changing instantly appeals to you, and maybe it doesn't, you don't need to carry around all that baggage. All you need to do to change right now is to “take the bull by the horns” and decide who you are consciously and purposefully. Simply decide that “this is who I desire to be.”

One word of caution. When you state, “This is who I desire to be,” you can very, very, easily digress into, “Well, this is who I am being even though I desire to be this person.” That is not the same as deciding, “This is who I am because this is who I prefer to be. This is how I see myself. This is the person I love.” You can be whoever you want to be.

When you “cut through the red tape” and decide who you are, you can shift your reality “on a dime,” or any denomination you choose.

What I am saying is to focus on who you want to be instead of who you do not. Once you decide who you want to be, you are that person. Any person that you may have been becomes irrelevant. You become the person you decide from that point forward until you change your decision.

An important point to understand is if you decide, “This is all nonsense,” you get it. If you decide, “That makes sense. I’ll give that a try,” then you get the partial result of someone who is trying. If you decide, “Ah! I can see how I’m already making decisions all the time. Okay, now I’m going to do it consciously instead, right now,” then you are no longer any other person you have ever defined yourself to be. You are now the preferred you.

Actions Reflect Your Decision

Now, if you trust that decision, your actions, perhaps subtly at first but eventually quite blatantly, will begin to reflect the decision. Those actions will have results, and even what you consider to be the external circumstances will seem to change. Understand in no uncertain terms that you create your reality through your actions. You perform an action that you consider to be a cause, and you get an effect. This is an apperency, but that is how it works. Action is the ultimate reflection of what you believe.

You Assign Meaning to Your Reality

One of the things that can make life confusing for you is that you look around at the world, and then you define and judge yourself in terms of what you see. You believe what you see, not realizing that what you see is actually a reflection of your beliefs. The result of this is that when something negative occurs in your reality, you may doubt your new decision saying, “Well, I guess I haven’t changed at all.” You let the reality dictate who you are.

You can take back your power by realizing that you must have created it. Then reinterpret and relabel the world from the perspective of the you that you decided to be. The world and all the circumstances have no built-in meaning. They are a neutral set of props, no matter how they may appear on the surface. You interpret those circumstances and place a meaning on them.

If you have decided that you are an empowered being, then you will ask, “Well, how does this situation serve me exactly as it is?” When you do that, that circumstance will benefit you and be of service to you. When you look at a negative circumstance from the eyes of the new you, you will realize it is not inherently negative and, in fact, it is there to help you.

Maintain Your Decision

When you say, “I guess I haven’t changed at all,” what are you doing? You are, in that moment, making a new decision. Even though you did change, completely and 100%, that decision “I haven’t changed at all” is very similar to previous negative decisions you made. Although it may seem like you haven’t changed at all, you have. You are still a new person because you have new knowledge and awareness.

The point of this is this: When something negative comes along, you may feel like you haven’t changed, your reality hasn't changed, you're wasting your time, or you're backsliding. The only reason that occurs is because you're not reminding yourself of who you decided to be. Reminding yourself who you decided to be is maintaining your decision. It is persistence. It is trusting the decision.

In other words, especially in the beginning, when life seems to contradict your decision, you think, "this stuff doesn't work," and so you give up, you cave in, and you don't maintain your decision.

In actuality, this is an opportunity because, on the flip side, anything that seems negative and shows you that you are not the new person you want to be is an opportunity to remind, reestablish, and realign to who you prefer to be. It's a reminder that you forgot who you chose to be.

That negative feeling is a reminder, a warning light, an annoying chime, and your lane departure warning. You can remind yourself, "Ah! Though this situation appears to be negative, the me that I prefer to be no longer chooses to interpret it that way. This is the new me. I have decided that I am going to interpret everything as new. I know, I created this, and I can derive service from each and everything."

When you do this, are persistent, and maintain your decision, you act like the you you want to be. The result of this is that you create a new set of circumstances. Your life changes.

This is important because, especially at first, your present physical life may be the result of your older decisions. Once you make the decision, "I am now this preferred person, and I am the consciousness of that preferred person,” you must then interpret your current circumstances and your current reality through the new you. If you do that, your life and reality will change. Your new interpretation completely changes the effect of those circumstances rather than perpetuating them on and on and on and on.

Whenever something in your life seems to be repeating itself, and you get that “Oh no! Here it comes again!” feeling, the only reason it appears to be repetitive is because you keep looking at it the same way. You keep interpreting it in the same way, and ultimately you keep acting in the same way. If you want your decision to stick, every once in a while, you just have to remind yourself of who you decided you want to be. That’s all.

Keeping reminding yourself to interpret your reality through your new self. If you want to be ascended, accept the version of consciousness that you are, express yourself fully and purposefully, and don’t settle for anything less than getting every positive thing out of life that you can. When you do this, you will experience being an ascended consciousness while still maintaining the apparency of a physical body and existing within this linear reality.

Living Consciously Brings Joy

Overall, in all of this, what we are saying is to dive into living your physical life fully, consciously, and according to who you want to be. Recognize that you are also a part of the one integrated whole. If you do that, you will have an experience that is unrivaled in the multiverse. You wouldn't want to miss it.

We Also Want to Remain Physical

Remember that my particle society still wants to be and chooses to be physical. Many people want to escape from this reality and be non-physical. Instead, what we are suggesting is that being physical can be an amazing experience.

While we are on the verge of the first phase of expressing ourselves non-physically, we have chosen throughout our history to experience being physical. We use the word history a bit loosely because time has a different meaning for us. We want to be conscious creators and take advantage of the unique opportunity to discover, be surprised, and experience the unexpected. Remember, when you are an infinite and all-knowing being, those things don't have any meaning.

Of course, you would not miss anything if you were non-physical. You wouldn't. However, this physical experience is about a gradient expression of your consciousness. It's about moving forward step by step, with life unfolding piece by piece. This is opposed to the holistic expression of your infinite consciousness, where everything just is and manifests instantly. In other words, in this reality, things generally happen step by step instead of all at once. That's the point. That's the joy of it. There's where the fun is.

You Create Your Reality 100%

Allow me to remind you once more that you do, as an infinite being, already contain it all. There is nothing outside infinity. There is no border to infinity. Anything that you hear, that you discover, is literally, literally you discovering more of yourself. You are not gaining something you never had and now do. You are discovering, opening up the cover, the veil, to more of who you already are.

If you feel like you have learned something, whether it is in this chapter or any other way, most accurately, you are now choosing to express what you already contain. You are manifesting what you already contain. You get the credit. You get 100% credit for the creation of your reality. Why? Because you 100% created it.

By all means, be proud and take the credit that you are due. You are an amazing person. You already create your reality through decision, trust, and action. The only slight change that you are unveiling or unboxing for yourself is that you now want to be more conscious and definitive about it. We are here as a reflection of that.

You can really have a lot of fun with this. Go around your reality and start reinterpreting your reality as the person you decided you wish to be. Watch how quickly your entire life and the relationships with both yourself and what you perceive to be others change 100%.

You Have to Change First

But remember that you have to change. The external reality will only change when you change the way you view it and the way you interact with it. If you want other people to change, you have to change first.

Each and every one of you is also a multidimensional, infinite, and eternal being and contains every potential, every possibility, and every expression. When you change the vibration you create reality with, you also change the vibration through which you interpret it. You change your reality through decision, trust, and action. Then you will literally interact with different versions of others. While they may seem to change, ultimately, it is you. Change is one of the few constants anyway.

Life Can Be Effortless

Though reality and life may seem complex, the way in which you create them is simple. Define who you are and express yourself fully. Reality will then be an effortless reflection of that. When we say effortless, we do not mean that you will not be surprised. Unexpected things will happen. Sometimes you may even be challenged. Effortless means not going against the grain of who you know yourself to be. It means not trying to be someone that you are not.

One way to interpret effort is going against your own grain and creating friction and resistance. This exhausts you, quite literally. Instead, be who you are. It is effortless.

Conclusion

Thank you once again, and for the first time since I am creating myself anew also. I am always experiencing each and every one of you as a new being and myself as a new being as well. Nice to meet you all.

How to Believe

We think that most people actually do understand that what they think and what they believe matters and that it has an impact on their lives. At the same time, we also realize that many people think that changing the way they think is difficult, not practical, and perhaps even impossible. They have had exposure to some of these “change the way you think” programs directly or indirectly and have not seen many meaningful positive changes in themselves or others. It is possible, however, to change the way you think. It can be easy, and that is what we will discuss in this chapter.

We will say this again and again that living the life you want is really very simple. In every moment, you create your reality, and for that matter, in every moment that you have ever existed, you have always done three things. Understanding and applying these three things are all it takes to change your life.

These three things are:

1. You make a decision. You decide on a fundamental level who you are.
2. You trust that decision. When you view reality, regardless of whether it confirms or contradicts who you are, you insist nevertheless that you are who you decided that you are.
3. You take action. You live and interact with your reality consistent with the decision you make about who you are. Action is the stuff that physical reality is made of, so to speak.

Remember, ultimately, you create physical reality, all of it. One of the conditions that you set up when you do this is that action is necessary. Action is the difference between simply thinking about something and having it manifest in your reality. Action is what makes what you believe official rather than just a fantasy.

When you change your actions, you change your physical output, and that appears to change your reality. We say this because an action is one of the things you consider to be most important when it comes to changing your reality.

You Are Always Deciding Who You Are

As a review and to reinforce this, let's talk a bit more about these three things. First, in every given moment, you create yourself 100%. Not 99%, not 98%, not 80% but 100%. In each of those moments, you make a decision. You make a decision about who you are. You always do this whether you are conscious about it or not, and you always will.

For the most part, up until now, you let reality define who you are. You looked at external circumstances, symbols, and timings (the past and the future), and then you decided who you were. You decide things like, “Well, my life is going this way, so this must be who I am. This must be the type of person that I am. Only this type of person would create this type of life.” In those cases, you have used your physical life as a gauge or yardstick for who you are.

You Can Decide Who You Are

When we talk about these things, we intentionally use the word “decision.” We do that because that reminds you that you have a choice. That reminds you that you can be conscious and intentional. If you want to create your reality consciously, you have to decide consciously. You are making decisions all the time anyway; you might as well do it consciously.

If you consciously decide who you want to be and who you know yourself to be, your life will more accurately represent who you know yourself to be.

Often what happens is that people look at their reality and use things like timing (the past and the future) to decide, “This is who I am.” For instance, they may say, “Because I was raised in this way, and these things happened when I was a child, or because of my past life, or because of something that happened yesterday, I am this person. This is who I am.”

When you make the decision using the past as your criteria, the decision still sticks, by the way. The effect you get is, “Yes, you are that type of person.” And, “Yes, you are because of this thing that you did or this thing that happened to you or this thing that you experienced.” The point that I am making is that in every single moment, you make a choice, and while you could let reality dictate to you who you are, you can instead decide purposefully and constructively. You can use the methods you already use to create your reality and do it intentionally.

Think about what you might answer if someone were to ask you who you are. My suggestion is to answer this question for yourself right now. Who is it that you see yourself as? How would you define your ideal self?

You are going to make a decision. If you make a conscious decision, “Alright. I wish my life to now be joyous, to be satisfying, fulfilling, and inspired,” then all you need do is create a decision about yourself consciously from your creative self, from your center, and include those ideas in the decision: satisfaction, inspiration, motivation, productivity, or whatever it is.

If someone were to ask, “Who are you?” you can answer that question with your decision about who you know yourself to be rather than what reality seems to dictate.

The Story You Buy Into

I remind you that you already do this. You already make a decision, whether you call it that or not. This is what you do. When a circumstance comes along, you tend to make a decision thinking that the circumstance is telling you who you are, but actually, still ultimately, you're making that decision yourself by buying into it.

From all the stories you see, it is only the story you buy into that determines your experience. Everything that you experience and feel occurs, actually occurs, within you and is created from you. So it is your decision.

Realizing that you can decide according to preference is a liberating notion. Allowing yourself to be conscious about who you are is an expansive approach to your reality.

Maintain That Decision

When you commit to that decision and maintain that decision, your reality reflects that. The first step, though, is to make a decision. The second step then is to trust the decision. This can also be called: maintaining the decision.

In each moment, you make a decision about who you are. If you consistently decide who you are, you create a continuity that lays down the foundation that changes your reality. That consistency allows you to see the changes in your life through the eyes of your new decision rather than the way you used to.

When you decide who you are, you see as that person. That person sees and interprets reality differently. If you have an empowered decision, you assume that everything in your reality supports your decision.

If something unexpected happens that you previously would have considered being bad, you now see it as an opportunity to see it through the eyes of your new decision.

When you do that, you interpret it differently and get a different effect.

Trust Is Easy

This is where some people lose hope and have trouble. Often when we mention “trust” or “faith,” we hear what you call a “rumbling,” a “groan” from individuals thinking, “Oh. I have to have faith? Oh boy! That is difficult!” For us, that is an ironic statement.

“Trust” and “faith” are things you always have. You always have trust. You always have faith in something. If you think, “Oh! I am doubting and therefore not having trust,” realize that doubt is not a lack of trust; doubt is a complete 100% trust in the reality you say you do not prefer.

When you realize this, you can remove the burden of trust because you do not have to “muster it up,” “build it up,” “exercise your trust muscles,” and then express it. You already trust in something. Instead, you can acknowledge to yourself, “Alright. I am trusting in something.”

Where that comes into this discussion is that you always make a decision, and if you trust in that decision and act as though that decision has registered, you get the effect of that decision. If you say you do not trust the decision, perhaps because external circumstances would seem to indicate that the decision was not registered, you are still trusting in something, and that’s generally a disempowered idea. When you trust in that “something,” it is truly the same thing as deciding that “something” instead of something you prefer. The point again is that you always do these things. You always decide. You always trust.

Recognize Your Doubts

If you think that perhaps you have some subconscious things that are interfering, you can simply decide consciously who you want to be. You then can use the same mechanism that you are already employing but use it constructively. Use it to have the desired effect and create the life that you prefer.

What this means is that when something comes up that is contrary to your decision, you remind yourself of your decision. That is trust. Trust means remembering and maintaining your decision. It means being consistent. To trust your decision, you need to maintain the decision and be consistent about it. That's what trust is.

Trusting a Decision vs. Affirmations

On the surface, trusting a decision can seem to be the same as a sort of affirmation. Many people have heard of the idea of affirmations and like the idea. The idea can be a powerful one; however, what happens is that often individuals will use affirmations in a disempowered way. They say one thing and yet believe something else. The affirmation is a sort of attempt to talk themselves into something.

Trust is different from affirmation. It might be more accurately called "asserting" or "making an assertion." Trust is not talking yourself into something. Trust is realizing that you're going to decide something anyway, either consciously or unconsciously, so why not decide on purpose and consciously? When circumstances arise that, for just a moment, due to your tendency of creating your reality in the older ways, the less empowered ways, seem to run contrary to your decision, you still have the opportunity in every given moment to reestablish the decision and to remind yourself of the decision you've already made.

In these situations, continuing to remind yourself of your decision is maintaining that decision and being consistent. It is another way to state "trusting the decision." It is using any feedback that you get from your reality, regardless if it seems supportive or in opposition to your decision, as an opportunity to realign you to your decision.

Interestingly enough, because you create yourselves 100% in every given moment, the moment you make the decision, you are that person, no "ifs, ands, or buts." There is no room for anyone else. That is who you are. Trust that your decision has registered itself and sticks in your reality.

Trusting the decision is complete confidence that your decision about "who I am" has been made by you consciously. "I was going to make a decision anyway. I choose to make it consciously, and I believe, I trust, I insist, that that decision sticks, and in making that decision, I am that person." Therefore, you are now able to see as that person.

"Who I am" vs. "Who I will be"

Making a decision is a very definite act of creation. Remember, when you state your decision, you become that person. Try keeping your decision down to one or two sentences. And also, try not to include words that imply that you are not already that person.

In other words, there is a difference between saying, “This is who I am,” and things like, “This is who I will be. This is who I wish to be. This is who I am becoming.” Becoming is different from being. If you word your decision, “I am becoming this. I am evolving toward that. I am slowly achieving this,” then that effect will be different than simply deciding, “This is who I am.”

Remove all that terminology and simply say, “This is who I am,” perhaps, “Just because I say so.” Then you will experience yourself as that person in that moment. When you trust your decision consciously by reminding yourself when circumstances may seem to say otherwise, you will feel a tinge of excitement knowing that now you are this person. You know and expect you will get what that person would get. If you haven’t liked the results you’ve been getting, I assume this would be very attractive.

To repeat again, trusting your decision means consistently reminding yourself of your decision. It means maintaining your decision when your reality may seem otherwise. You allow reality to give you feedback and use it to remind you to realign to your decision. You also allow your reality to show you where you may wish to alter or revise your decision.

Update Your Decision as Necessary

When you express yourself fully by acting like the preferred you, your circumstances, your experiences, and what you attract will change. When that happens, you may find that you want to revise the decision you made about who you prefer to be to an even more empowered one. By all means, be willing and open to updating your decision.

Allow the decision to be honed, carved, and worked in such a way that it is polished and truly reflects who you are. The moment you make the decision and trust that that decision sticks, you then get to, so to speak, “reality test” the decision and see if the decision works for you. If it is an empowered decision, no matter what changes you make in it over time, it will still remain foundationally an empowered approach that can only allow you to yield positive experiences in your life.

Be Consistent

You already do this, by the way. In every moment, you are deciding who you are. You either trust in the conscious decision you made, or you shift your trust and decision by letting circumstances or other factors decide who you are. When you change your decision, you will get new results. If you go back and forth, shifting your decision, shifting your decision, that is a random expression of your decision.

I don't need to tell you that randomly shifting your decision creates an experience that feels random. When you do that, you feel like life is happening to you rather than from you. Your life feels random rather than purposeful. Your life feels accidental rather than synchronous or serendipitous. These experiences are all from decisions that you are making.

Make Your Decision Stronger

You can simplify your creative ability by very finely honing in, stating your decision, clarifying that decision, that vision, and stating it after the words “I am.” Allow your body posture and your attitude to exemplify that decision, “I am this person.” That is what trusting the decision is all about.

Pay Attention to How You Decide

If you pay attention to how you are living your life, you will see in no uncertain terms how you are always deciding and trusting in something. You will be amazed at how many creative ways you actually support the experiences in your life you say you do not prefer. You continue to get negative results because of your decisions and because you let circumstances and timing dictate your decisions.

When you observe this, you are still making a decision not to make a positive decision, but at least it is a step in the direction of entertaining the idea that perhaps you just might have something to do with the creation of your reality. By all means, take as much time as you need. Create whatever process you wish. Create whatever elaborate set of steps that you need in order to allow yourself to finally make any decision.

Drop the Process and Just Decide

In the end, no matter what process you create, no matter what ritual you participate in, ultimately, at some point along that linear process, you will get a result. That result will not in any way be due to the process but will be due only to you in that moment deciding, “This is who I am.” While you do this, you’re actually saying, “The reason that I can now be this person is because of this elaborate process.” But ultimately, it is the decision after the process, “Now, it’s alright to be this person,” that allows you to be that person and not the process in any way.

You can decide who you are right now. You don’t need to create a process unless you find that you enjoy it. Maybe you don’t enjoy immediately and completely transforming the face of your entire life and reality. Maybe you don’t enjoy transforming your experience, your interpretation of your reality, and immediately transforming your relationships with yourself and others.

“Who Are You?”

A question that I like to ask is, “Who are you?” I like to ask this question because it allows you to begin to consider who you are in a conscious way. If you wish to play along, you can. I will not force anyone to have too much fun by stating the positive decision of who they choose to be in definite and absolute terms, thereby giving them the ability and opportunity to see who they desire to be now.

You can always answer, “I have not yet committed to that decision.” Don’t feel on the spot or that you must define yourself. However, if you are willing to, that will be your first step in beginning to express yourself in conscious terms according to preference. You can allow your experience to reflect who you know yourself to be rather than who everyone says you are, rather than what your circumstances seem to be telling you, rather than how your past has resulted in your lot in life, or for that matter rather than how your future has resulted in your lot in life.

Don't Let the Future Decide

People often define themselves not only by their past but by their future: “Well, I need to do this, and I haven’t done that. This needs to be handled. This needs to be taken care of.” The bottom line of the decision in that moment is “I am not a prepared being and expect my reality to have a negative outcome. Perhaps if I swim a little harder, run a little faster, and work a little bit more laboriously, I might just head off the process.” Alright, that’s one way to look at it.

However, that approach is not necessarily being a “conscious creator,” and the statement of a “conscious creator” always begins with the sentiment or the wording, “I am (fill in the blank).” You get to choose what goes in that blank. You already do.

Now that you know this, you can play a shell game with your intentions and consciousness, but there is no escaping the fact that you now have the information that I just shared. You have revealed to yourself in perfect timing, using what you consider to be me as a reflection, what you already know to be true for yourself, and what you are now ready to hear.

Remember: You Create Your Reality

When I say that “You create your reality 100%,” I mean it. Everything that you see is a reflection of you. The paradox is that this is true for all other individuals. But you don’t need to confuse and perplex yourself over this idea. Simply marvel over it from time to time. Everything exists within you. Every single thing that you perceive is created by you to support any decision that you make in your reality.

Sometimes a situation will seem to support your decision very clearly. You can easily interpret it by saying, “I see my decision stuck. These circumstances prove it.” Sometimes, however, reality will seem to give you feedback that seems to run contrary to your decision. This is an opportunity to allow yourself to really decide if this is who you are or if you can easily be talked out of the decision. If you get talked out of it, then you are making a new decision based on what everyone says or what circumstances and timing seem to dictate. It is up to you to remain focused. It is up to you to continue to express yourself consciously and continuously.

Conclusion

Thank you for interacting with me and establishing that at least part of your decision is to explore more of yourself and attract symbols, external symbols, such as me, that begin to support your empowered decision. I thank you for allowing me to act as a facilitator but, more accurately, as a mirror.

You can only appreciate, use, and understand anything that you perceive that I am saying if you first already contain it.

Otherwise, these words would be “ink on a page,” and you would not comprehend anything. The fact that you can read it, the fact that it resonates with you, and the fact that it seems to inspire you is your direct indication that you already contain that potential within yourself. Ultimately speaking, you are an infinite multidimensional, and eternal being, and you contain it all.

We also get a lot out of this. We also see all of you as an external reflection of us and understand that each unique point of view we interact with, which seems like an interaction with an external being, is simply a more personal exploration of facets of our own particular individual consciousness.

Again, I thank you for allowing me to interact with you in this way, albeit an unconventional way presently, in your mass society. For you give me the honor of allowing me to reflect on who I am and allowing you to reflect on who you are. I thank you unconditionally and lovingly.

How to Eliminate Drama

Sometimes people say that they are sick of the drama in their lives. In this chapter, we will show you how to get rid of this. We will begin by giving some background so that we can tell you what to do.

We consistently remind you that when you create your reality, in each and every moment, you always do some form of the following.

First, in every moment, you make a decision about who you are. You base that decision on many different things. Often people will base that decision on external circumstances: "I am this person because this has occurred to me." They use the feedback they get from what they consider to be other individuals to decide that "I am this person because everyone tells me so all the time. So, I must be."

You can choose who you want to be simply because that's who you want to be. Only you truly know you. The decision that you make determines your experience, and your reality will then support your decision. Whether you see it that way or not is what the next point is.

Second, once you make that decision, in every moment, in fact, you then trust that decision till you change it. Trusting that decision can also be defined as maintaining the decision. If you commit to the decision and maintain it, you are performing the expression of trust in the initial decision. That means you interpret everything in your experience as supportive of your decision regardless of whether it appears that way on the surface or not.

Third, the way that you create your reality is by taking action. Though you are fundamentally infinite beings, you are exploring “linear reality,” which creates the apparency of “before, during, and after.” When you are playing in linear reality and expressing yourself through linear means, the actions that you take are the hub and are your most visible expression. They seem to create a cascading series of what you call “causes and effects,” and that seems to create your reality physically.

Actuality vs. Apparency

There is a distinction between what you call actuality and what you call apparency. The actuality is that you are multidimensional, infinite, and eternal beings. The apparency that you create, to explore yourselves in a very finite discrete way, is that you are linear beings: you are born, you live, and you die, and that is it.

Often as you entertain the actuality that you are infinite beings, you begin to express more and more of the infinite potential that lies within you. Because your approach in exploring linear reality is to explore your reality as a seeming series of events, you create your reality as a gradient from the infinite. In other words, you generally gauge and view your experience along a gradient, step by step.

Though the actuality is that you create your reality 100% in any given moment, the apparency is that you do not have complete control over your entire reality. The porthole on this gradient that allows you to express yourself consciously is action. If you wish to insist that you do not have complete control over your entire reality, you can understand that by playing with the gradient that you create, you do have complete control over one thing: your action.

Your Response

For the purposes of this discussion, we will refer to the action that you take in any given moment as your response. You always have complete control over your response and the action you put out in your reality. You assess your reality, you make decisions about it, and then you respond. It is this response that you have total control over in every given moment.

As you are playing in this reality on a gradient and increasing how you express yourself consciously, the way you create your reality according to preference is by first gauging your response. You respond in a way that is reflective of your decision, and you allow your actions to reflect and express the decision you have made about yourself.

Responding Consciously

You always do this anyway, as you say, somewhat automatically. However, once you become aware of how you express your reality and the methodology through which you do so, you then allow yourself the option of doing so consciously.

We have discussed in detail that you can make decisions consciously. We have also discussed in detail that maintaining that decision can also be a conscious choice. You can continue to make the decision about yourself that is representative of who you prefer yourself to be and who you know yourself to be rather than who everyone says you should be or who reality seems to dictate you already are. Conscious choice comes into play.

Since you express yourself on a gradient, you have a tendency not to automatically and immediately transform the entire face of your reality instantaneously. You play the gradient. You play with the idea of unfurling yourself a bit at a time. The apparency is that it is your actions that create the series of events that eventually position your physical life to be the life that you desire.

You Desire to Be Physical

You could spontaneously transform your entire reality completely; however, you have a tendency not to do so for very specific reasons. One reason is that you want to maintain the degree of focus that you have chosen to express as a physical being.

Rather than forsaking yourself because “some portion,” as you sometimes break yourself up into, seems to decide that you will not transform immediately, you still have your response. You are always able in any given moment to gauge your response and to choose what it is that you will do.

Separate Your Perception and Your Action

As a being, you create a separation between your perception, what you take in from your reality, and your action or response, what you put out. When you do this, in general, you will go through the following motions. First, you perceive your reality, generally through what you call your senses. Second, you then interpret that perception. Third, you respond. By response, I do not necessarily mean the emotional reaction that you create. I am specifically referring to you eventually doing something with the information. Eventually, you act. If you have chosen to transform on a gradient, this is where your power lies.

It is very easy to see whether you have chosen on a higher-self level to transform on a gradient or not. Simply close your eyes, decide that everything around you has transformed, and then open your eyes. If, when you open your eyes, many things still seem the same, so to speak, you can safely assume that you have chosen the gradient path.

You can use the path that you have chosen rather than forsake it by gauging your response. You are always able to respond and have complete control over your response if you are willing to acknowledge and express that.

However, if you decide that your response and actions are automatic and that they're out of your control, you then create a plethora of explanations as to why your response is out of your control: "It's my ego. It's my tendency. It's my habits." These are things that you create to literally give you an excuse that your response is not conscious and purposeful. However, always, if you are completely willing to acknowledge it to yourself, in any given moment, your response is up to you.

There's a Buffer

You create the apperency that action is what transforms your reality. In this way, you create a buffer so that every random thought doesn't become your reality or a random series of events.

There is a space between perceiving and interpreting your reality and action. By using the action as a gradient, you give yourself more finely tuned control over all the thoughts, ideas, and explorations that occur to you. You can express only the ones purposefully that you choose to have a result in your life. That is how you gauge your actions and use the apperency that your actions create your reality.

You Are Response Able

In actuality, as you say, “thoughts are things,” but the apparency that you are using to create in this reality, in a very focused way, is that it is the action you take from those thoughts that actually moves the reality in a linear way. Rather than doubt yourself constantly, you can simply gauge your response. You are response able. You are response enabled.

Simply by realizing that you are ready to use it, you can. By all means, you can continue to perceive your reality. You can continue to initially interpret your reality according to habit, some of which may be negative. But, if you withhold action until you realign to the positive decision of who you are, you give yourself the opportunity through that buffer to only have very specific positive results.

Action Appears to Create Your Reality

The idea that action creates the reality, we remind you, is an apparency, but it is an apparency that you create for a reason. In every given moment, the actuality is that whoever you decide you are, you are. You are that person. But the apparency that you create for the purposes of focus and purposefulness is that the action that you then take creates the physical reality.

That action is where your power lives. If you are choosing to exist, create, and express your reality from the gradient of action, you give back to yourself your power. Even if your initial assessment or interpretation of a situation is negative, if you don't immediately act with that negative foundation, if you remind and realign yourself to who you know yourself to be, and then respond, then act, you then create the apparency of total control of your reality. Maybe not in how the circumstances play out, but in how you respond.

One of the things that you are exploring in this lifetime and in this reality is the idea of hiding part of yourself from all of yourself. This allows you to experience the apparency that you learn, that you grow, and that things are unexpected. This is all part of the gradient that you are creating.

The circumstances that come into your perception will be from time to time unexpected, but if the actions that you take from these circumstances are positive and are aligned with your decision and who you know yourself to be, then the results of those actions will only generate positive physical circumstances and results.

Continuity and Persistence

The key is to be consistent and persistent in having your actions be an unbroken series of actions that are reflective of your positive decision, plus your positive trust in the decision about who you know yourself to be.

If you “restrain” yourself from acting until you are realigned flawlessly, consistently, and persistently, and if all of your actions are positively aligned with your decision, then your reality, even along the very gradient that you are creating, transforms extremely quickly and seemingly miraculously. This is because you are now in alignment with who you say you are. You are now expressing self-consciously according to preference.

When you “interrupt yourself,” so to speak, nothing is truly an interruption. By inserting actions that are based on a negative foundation, such as negative actions, negative interactions with other people, and negative responses to your reality, then each of those actions will seem, along the gradient and apparency that you create, to have an effect “down the line.”

When your actions are not gauged and consistently positive, you might still say, “Oh! Everything is going so well.” However, at the first sign of something coming up that would seem to be negative, many of you, to use your vernacular, “cave.” You cave in and say, “Oh! It doesn’t work.” You don’t realize that that seemingly negative circumstance is a direct result of an action you took. When you do this, you are playing along the gradient, the apparency that the actions have momentum, and the actions have a cause and effect. As a result, your results become scattered and random.

Remind Yourself Who You Are

When we say gauge your response, we mean you can have any initial reaction or perception about anything that occurs in your reality but simply do not act on it. Instead, remind yourself of who you are and then act. Be willing to not act at all until you realign, and then your actions will become an unbroken series of positive expressions of who you say you are.

Actions Speak Louder Than Words

One of the rules that you created through the apparency gradient of action is “actions speak louder than words.” One way to put this simply is that your actions and your response, in any given moment, are the strongest expressions of whichever belief you are expressing in that moment.

So, if your action is an automatic result of a negative perception you have about your reality, then you are expressing in your reality, physically, a negative belief. It's not that beliefs happen to you. You contain all beliefs, all the beliefs and their opposites. What determines what you create in your life is which one you act on. The one that you act on in that given moment is telling you, “Of all the beliefs that I contain, I am expressing this one.” The action that you perform is the direct reflection of your strongest belief, no matter what you say.

Responding Consciously Is the Key

Your ability to respond consciously, your “response-ability” is your power. It is the key and fulcrum that will allow you to apply the knowledge you have attracted up until this point in your life. More accurately, it is the knowledge that you already contained and are now willing to express. Perhaps the missing link, the puzzle piece, or the key for which many of you say you search, is the idea of withholding your response and action in any given moment until you are positively aligned.

Proof in 3 Days

You can transform your entire life visibility within 3 weeks if you apply these principles. If you wish to get proof, you can see absolutely compelling reflections merely by being consistently positively aligned in your actions for 3 days.

Many of you say over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over again that you desire to create a life that you prefer and that you desire to express yourself in your reality and have an impact in your reality. The key to doing so along the gradient is to have your actions only be purposeful.

Count to 10

You have an expression, “count to 10.” You also sometimes use this expression, “do not immediately act from impulse.” Generally, “impulse,” by the way, can be interpreted. One way to interpret it in the negative is to have an immediate reactionary response rather than a purposeful actionary response.

Counting to 10 creates a gap, an artificial gap, between immediate, impulsive negative action and realigning to who you are. Generally speaking, for most of you, in almost every given situation, it can take a mere 10 to 30 seconds to realign to who you are.

Just as important as it is to act according to who you know yourself to be is to refrain from acting until your foundational decision and trust are realigned to the you you prefer to be, not the you that you say may be so undesirable. Your power on a plate. That is it.

Be Consistent

You gauge that response when you begin to have your actions, also known as your responses, be conscious, continuously, and consistently. You will then see consistent positive results.

Enjoy the Unexpected

Regardless of how you act, you will still create a life that will be unexpected and full of surprises. Things will still come up that perhaps were not exactly what you prepared for. In every single instance, you are the one who interprets them, and you can still be excited. “Ah! When I acted the way I wanted, I expected one thing to happen, but something else happened instead. Since I am committed to who I am, and my actions reflect that, this must be blatantly and more obviously beneficial for me than what I expected.”

When you do that, you perceive and interpret unexpected things positively and with anticipation. There is nothing that can seem to creep in there. You then see everything as part of the process and not an interruption in it.

You Already Do This

As I have often shared, you already do this and always have. What we are discussing now is doing it consciously. When I say you’ve already been doing this, I mean you always decide, “This is who I am,” no matter what your criteria are, you always trust in that decision till you change it, and you always respond with that decision as a foundation.

We are not discussing doing anything new. Perhaps the approach is new. Perhaps purposefulness, focusing, and maintaining a conscious focus on who you are may appear or feel new, but you have always done this anyway. Any result that you are experiencing is automatically the result of that approach, which you have expressed so perfectly your whole entire life and, if you wish to get technical, your whole entire existence.

Being Responsible Is Not Blame

Often responsibility in your reality can be negatively interpreted as blame. “I am responsible. I am to blame.” That is one way to put it, but that is not an empowering acknowledging self-expressive way to understand it. When you decide “I am to blame,” you have made a decision. Built into that decision and implicated by that decision is that you are a negative person, that you have done something wrong, you cannot change that you are a habitual being, and therefore, by extension, that your actions are completely out of your control, or maybe only partially in your control.

Your ability to respond means that no matter what you have done and no matter who you have been, you can choose yourself anew in any given moment, and you can use that ability to respond positively. If you have done something negative in your past that you know is not representative of who you now choose to be, that is an opportunity that allows you to align with the positive idea of who you are. This means that nothing you have done, no matter how negative, is extraneous.

Everything that you have done can be used to reinforce a positive decision about who you are. Therefore, response-able, responsible, response-ability, responsibility, can be interpreted in the most empowered way, which is that you have full, complete, and conscious command over what you put out in your life. Whatever vibration you are being when you put something out is the result you seem to get back along this apparency gradient.

The actuality is that once you make the decision, you are the vibration of that decision. You are that person. The apparency you create is that you first must perform an action to cause the series of events to create the evidence of being that person.

Merging Apparency and Actuality

When you act within the apparency you have created in your life and act consciously, the results of those conscious actions will drive your consciousness back into the now moment. When you choose to be who you are consciously, to respond as that person, and to get the results of that person, one of the effects is that your consciousness seems to slide back into the now moment whereby the apparency seems to lift and disappear. This allows you to then experience the actuality and have your whole reality change.

On hearing this often, one of the ways you will try to prove this is by playing the game of saying that once you have proven it to yourself, you will then create yourself to be more expressive in the moment. When you do this, you create the apparency of the “middle man or woman of action.”

You May Feel Not Completely in Control

Because you may feel, “I do not have control over the people that I interact with. I do not have control over having to pay the rent tomorrow and not having the money. What do I have control over?” As you live according to expressing yourself on this gradient, what you have in any given moment is your response. You can choose from what is available what you will act on. That is your door. That is your key. That is your missing link. That fulcrum and that ability is your puzzle piece.

When you express yourself in this way, you may initially notice that you still may perceive an event, a circumstance, or some relationship in a negative way, but you will understand that if you withhold your action until you realign, no matter what you are thinking in that circumstance, it is only the action that you perform that has the result. You will see that you can have any initial negative reaction and, by having a positive action, get a positive result despite still having a tendency to create negative interpretations.

Once you see in action that responding positively, no matter what your initial interpretation is, creates a positive result, you will immediately begin to see your interpretation transform.

Be Kind to Yourself

Also, don't be so initially negative. Often individuals judge themselves very harshly because their initial reaction and interpretation of their reality are negative. When you understand that when you withhold your actions, realign, and have the actions be a positive expression of who you are, then you realize that you don't need to judge yourself negatively. That type of interpretation is no longer relevant. Those interpretations are dated stuff.

When you act purposefully, you also transform your tendency to interpret your reality in a specific way. You replace your negative tendency with a positive one. You recognize that no matter what the reality seems to present, since you will only perform a positive action, you will only get a positive result. You realize that the circumstances in and of themselves cannot be inherently negative. Your former approach of initially labeling things negative melts away and becomes completely irrelevant to the you that you are consciously expressing rather than simply entertaining.

Start Acting the Way You Want

When you hear what we are saying, many of you entertain the idea that your life can actually be the way you want, but until your actions reflect that, it is only entertainment. When your actions reflect that, and you get the corresponding results, you create the physical evidence that shows you that this is far more than simply entertaining the idea that you create your reality and demonstrates that you are actually an infinite being expressing yourself in finite terms. When you gauge your actions accordingly, all the evidence becomes supportive of your positive decision, rather than a reflection of indecision or a reflection of the apparency that your reality is a reactive event rather than a proactive event.

Hello

I Hope You Are Excited!

To us, this is very exciting, and I hope that you think so too. If this is not the case, perhaps you have not yet grasped the simplicity of what I am saying, or perhaps you are still rather attached to the idea of random events, random effects, and polarity experience. That is all right. That is all well and good because you always set your own pace, and nobody will rush you into exploring more of yourself. At the same time, when you decide to, no one can slow you down.

Living Can Be Easy

Though your reality is quite complex, the living and expressing of yourself can be rather easy. It is a very useful idea when you transform who you are. You are always deciding, "I am this person. I trust I am this person, and my actions now will reflect and express that person."

Again, we are not sharing with you something that you need to practice or something that you need to develop expertise in. You are all consummate experts at creating your reality randomly. Congratulations!

You Attracted This for a Reason

You attract interactions that reflect you looking beyond the status quo, such as this one, because you are now ready to express more of yourself. We are discussing specifically what is meant by expression, which is your response. By all means, if it is attractive to you to express your reality in positive terms and create the life that you prefer and desire, explore what I am sharing with you and use the methods you are already exercising and masterfully employing.

Summary

To sum it all up, rather than trying to transcend and escape linear reality, use it by accepting the gradient approach and gauge your response by aligning with your most positive self. In a very purposeful way, employ your conscious commandant: "This is who I am, just because. I know myself better than anyone else. This is who I am; therefore, a person who is this person has a particular approach, has a particular response."

If you align with your most positive understanding of who you are, you will find out just how creative you are in any given situation to respond in the most loving and positive way, assuming that what you choose to experience in your life is a loving and positive result. Perhaps some of you wish for something else.

When you put out that action, create that vibration of positivity, of generosity, and of lovingness, that is what you get back, and that is what many of you say you desire. When you see what seems to be coming back in your direction, you can use that to look at your actions.

The goal is not to blame or judge yourself but simply to observe that perhaps, maybe, in certain given situations, your response is not always reflective of your most empowered version of who you are and may, in fact, be, perhaps, just perhaps, occasionally, a bit disempowered. Once you realize what you are doing, you can do something else. You can also bypass the analysis and only do things that represent who you decide you are.

Although we have broken all of this down into three components—decision, trust, and action—for the purposes of elucidating, and explaining, and defining the mechanism that you use to create your reality, you will find that they are truly one event. The decision and the trust are always expressed as the action. Perhaps the most important thing to be mindful of at this point as you create in this way is the action. This is the next step, perhaps in many ways the final step of expanding your consciousness into expressing yourself in preferred terms according to your desire and according to your excitement. It is expressing your knowingness that everything is one integrated expression, that is you.

Speaking Is an Action

One slight clarification is that your response and your action can also be what you say. When you say something, that is an action. That is a response. At least at this point, you rely on talking quite heavily. What you say represents who you are being in that moment. When we say, “Gauge your response,” you can also apply that to what you say.

All of this is what we do. Everything to us is conscious. The action that I seem to be taking here is verbal, and on the many levels that we create this interaction and interact with you, it is the expression of “who I am.” Perhaps, for now, it is the only form that you will allow yourself to see.

Conclusion

Remember, from your point of view, I only exist within you. Anything that I say is something that you are now reflecting very consciously, very blatantly, back to yourself. You get the credit.

One of the creative ways that you attract the tools and resources you need to move forward in your life is by creating external reflections that show you options. In this case, that is us, not that what we are saying is any better than any other approach you have or anything you are doing. We simply are a reflection that you create to show yourself that you can expand into a more joyful version of who you know yourself to be.

At least for me, from my part of this interaction, that is what I represent. I am a being who chooses joy and a being who chooses full experience, fully committed expression, positive output, positive experience, positive perception, and interpretation. Whatever reflection you attract is only you talking back to yourself in elaborately removed terms.

By all means, use this resource. You will find that when you put this out, almost every single direction will spit that back, so to speak, to you. People may seem to change, but really it is you expressing yourself differently and, therefore, attracting the reflections that reinforce that reflection. In linear reality, action represents that fulcrum.

Hello

When Life Is Not Going the Way You Want

If life is not going the way you want, the good news is that you can change it, and you can actually change it quickly. This is what we will talk about in this chapter.

It is always right here and right now. You are the one deciding that it is not going the way you want. You are perceiving and interpreting your reality in a particular way.

While you may feel like you are in a reality, you are an infinite being. When you fail to understand that you created it all, including time and space itself, you may feel like some other place, time, and situation would be better. This point in space and time is the most perfect place for you to be unless you decide otherwise.

For example, if you feel inadequate, you may manifest a physical reality that contains an apparent lack of money, mean people, and a home you don't like. This could be because you actually don't have the things you say you want, but it can also be because you don't realize that you already do have what you want. If you think about it, you will see that both are true.

Changing your perception is much easier if you understand more of the mechanics of how reality is created. Your reality is an apparency. It may appear that you need these physical things to have happiness, but that's not what your desire for them is telling you. They are telling you that you are, on some fundamental level, stubbornly failing to see that you are indeed adequate, do indeed contain it all, and do have everything you need right here and right now.

You are instead buying into the idea that you are inadequate right here and right now, and in fact, in every right here and right now moment.

Many people fear that if they do see their own adequacy that they will not need those material manifestations, and that is true, but paradoxically those people will enjoy them even more. That is because they will come easily and be a sort of "graduation," reflecting your growth and the beauty you already contain.

You don't go to school to graduate. You go to school to learn and grow. Graduation is simply a symbol of your growth. You could just skip school and have the graduation party, but it would not be the same.

You are now on the fringes of understanding what you would refer to in your vernacular as an infinite concept. Infinity allows for all possibilities, not merely one or another. It always includes both.

From your linear point of view, sometimes infinite concepts seem as though they are paradoxical, or mutually exclusive, but when you get down to understanding yourself as a whole being, you will understand that it is all true. The ultimate truth is, by necessity, composed of all truths. Leave one out, and it's the ultimate truth minus one and, therefore, not ultimately the truth in the way you understand these terms in your language.

It's Your Version of Reality

All that you perceive is your version of reality, your version of circumstance, and your version of any other individual you perceive you are interacting with. Your version is what you create, and your version is what you interact with.

“Now” Seems Like a Series of Moments

You are infinite creators creating the experience of being linear. As a linear being, you still maintain the concept of now. “Now,” as you sometimes say, “is the only time there really is.”

You create your reality as a seeming succession of “nows” that seem to come one after another. More accurately, it is one eternal now. Your infinite point of view exists right now in its entirety. It is not becoming anything that it isn't already but being completely everything right now. Even though you do experience you as a seeming progression of nows, each now, when you choose to understand this, is complete and contains it all.

You Already Have What You Need

Another way of looking at this is that right now, you have everything you need to do anything you want, to be any person you want, and to experience any reality that you know is true for you.

The idea of becoming something that you are not already is an illusion. When you do that, you are playing out of what you create as a succession of “nows,” but ultimately, a decision is made right now, and that is your experience.

Often you will assume that in a “given now” moment, there is something to obtain, there is a goal to reach, and there is something to become that you aren’t already. This is an apparency, and it is part of the decision that you make, and that decision in and of itself says, “I am not this and will become that,” in a so-called “different now.” When you do that, you experience not having what you need right now. However, that is only because of your approach, your interpretation, and your decision right now.

What I am suggesting, and what I am reflecting to you in perfect timing in how you have attracted this information, and how you attract any knowledge, timing, and resources that you create in your life, is the concept that you already have what you need right now. You already have the knowledge that you need to at least take the appropriate step right now. You already know what you need to know when you need to know it right now.

When you realize that you already know it, whatever “it” happens to be, and build that into your decision in the moment, you can then access your knowledge and power right now. Not tomorrow. Not one minute from now, but right now.

When you play with the idea that you do contain the answers, that you do contain the power, and that you can do the things you say you desire already, you can step in accord with your power and, so to speak, channel your power into the present. You already channel your power into the present, but when you are not specific about your decision about who you are in the present, you introduce an element you generally refer to as randomness as opposed to purposefulness.

When you understand that you contain it all, that you know what you need to know, and that there is something right now that you can do that will allow you to fully be who you are, you can be conscious in the management and the dispensation of your power, which again, I remind you, you will use anyway.

Focus on What Excites You Right Now

What we are introducing is purposefulness. You all seem to say, “What is my purpose?” Your purpose is completely up to you. An indicator of your purpose is what you refer to as your passion or your excitement about what is available in any given right now moment. Something will always stand out as feeling more exciting to do than anything else.

We have discussed many times in many interactions with many members of your society that this vibrational discernment is you reflecting back to yourself in the situation who you are. Of the alternatives in any moment, you can know what alternative is most representative of the you that you know yourself to be.

You Are Deciding Right Now

As we have discussed, in each and every now moment, right now, you make a decision about who you are. That decision can be based on many things. We suggest that you decide who you want to be based upon who you know yourself to be.

The only thing that ever keeps you from being the person you want to be is you deciding right now that you are not. From that decision, you will generally plug into that idea that you must do “this, this, this, and this” before you will decide that you are. Ultimately, this boils down to the decision, “This is who I am.”

Begin to ask yourself, “Who am I? Who would I want to be if I could be anyone?” This allows you to begin to clarify, to define, to establish, to discern, and to ascertain who you are according to your own criteria.

Although sometimes other people will say, “I know you better than you know yourself,” this is impossible. Only you know who you are.

Someone can say, “You are this person,” and you can then decide, “Well, they must be right because everyone always tells me so.” But ultimately, you are the one agreeing with their decision. That is what gives you the effect of being that person.

Only you know who you are. Anyone else’s feedback is simply a reinforcement of who you are. Either their opinions are accurate, and you can say, “Yes, that’s me,” or they’re inaccurate, and that simply makes it more clear who you are by seeing who you are not.

Your decision is always made right now. Whoever you decide that you are right now, you are. And then right now, if you choose to be someone else, you are, automatically and across the board.

This mechanism is always in place, always has been, and always will be. You don’t need to gain the spiritual tools and knowledge to be who you are. You just have to remember that you already apply those tools 100%. You always decide something. Because you have done this flawlessly your whole entire life, and in fact before, you are experts at deciding who you are.

Consciously Decide Who You Are

The key point is to consciously decide who you are. That is what allows you to create consciously. Plus, being conscious also transforms what you might have labeled “subconscious” or “unconscious.”

When you label something as subconscious or as coming from your unconscious closet, you are really just making a fancily worded decision that allows for randomness, for hiding parts of yourself from yourself, and for rationalizing unpreferred behavior. If you simply decide to decide right now, that is all it takes to express yourself consciously. Your decision, being the product of a conscious understanding, immediately transforms any effects that would appear to be subconscious or unconscious.

Sometimes we will make the statement, “What you refer to as unconscious knowingness is really the same as conscious unknowingness.” What this basically boils down to mean is that you still decide not to decide. When you do this, the effects seem to come from another source, but there is no other source.

You Create It All

You are the infinite creators of your reality. You are such an expert at creating your reality completely that you can experience the apparency of an external universe. You are such an expert at completely expressing yourself in finite terms that it can seem as though you are in reality, but a minute member, a grain of sand in the infinity of creation. This is the degree as a creator of power that you possess. You have the ability to completely forget that you even created it all.

Again, the advantage of forgetting who you are is that it allows you to uncover, discover, and see who you are. That joy of discovery is part of the advantage of linear thinking and linear experience. You can still have the joy of discovery, and you can still have the experience of expansion without needing to perpetuate the illusion that you are “but a grain of sand in infinity.” This is what you are beginning to do.

This Is All a Reflection of You

You attracted yourself to this book. We are not any better than any other source, but our approach is expanded and completely self-empowering. The mere fact that you attracted this tells you that this is your time and that this is you unfolding your timing to yourself. Even in calling us or myself another source, I am playing into the illusion, for I am truly foundationally, fundamentally, most basically you.

When you see anything you find desirable in anything, including our approach, it is simply you reveling in what you already contain. This is why we do not accept credit. It is like walking up to the mirror and saying to the mirror, “You have helped me to be more me.” Well, alright, perhaps. That’s one way to look at it.

But ultimately, you are the originating brilliance reflected back to yourself. You are the one then beholding the reflection and marveling. The mirror is also you as well. We remind you of this because to reflect to yourself who you are, you do not have to create an elaborate process nor unusual circumstances. Although, it is a very creative way to go about it.

A book such as this, by all means, is one way to reflect to yourself, but so is walking down your street and simply beholding something that you find inspiring, interacting with another individual, feeling that individual, breathing the air of your planet, or smelling a beautiful flower. All of these things are you reflecting back to yourself. They are cause for celebration of yourself and of your willingness to express yourself in such a way that you are able to appreciate who you are and express yourself this way.

Hello

“Now” Is Your Power

This all always occurs right now. Right now is your point of power, is your porthole of entry, is your center point. Since it always exists, and because it is always right now, you are never ever, ever, ever, ever, ever, ever cut off from yourself or your power unless you decide that that is who you are in that right now moment. If you choose to make such a disempowering decision, you are still exercising your power 100%.

There Is Not an Off Switch

As creators, you do not have an off switch. You are always on. Your ability enables you to interpret your reality through this understanding, through the understanding that your power is nothing to obtain, your power is nothing to grow toward, your power is nothing to become, and your power is who you are.

Unconditionally Love Yourself

That was a mouthful. On that note, I will give you the pleasure of a short introduction. Allow me to simply say, our sentiment toward you and toward all beings, but you as well, is unconditional love and appreciation. This means, no matter what, no matter who you decide to be right now, we will always love you and appreciate that decision even though that decision may completely differ from a decision that perhaps we would make. I do not mention this because it is us, and we occupy any place of authority. I mention it as an example and as an invitation to treat yourself with that same respect.

When you unconditionally love and appreciate yourself, which is only a decision, by the way, you free yourself up to express yourself effortlessly and fully, and you replace any former decision that you have made that your self-love must be earned. If you decide your self-love must be earned, that is conditional self-love.

Conditional self-love is not a law or a tendency of the universe. It is a decision as well. When you conditionally love yourself, if you fall short of who you think you should be, you render the judgment, you get the effect, and you create the true opposite of unconditional love, which is the emotion you refer to as guilt.

All you need do is to take that same ability that you have to make a decision and simply decide, "I unconditionally love and appreciate myself. This means no matter what I do or no matter what I may attract, that love is a given." That is a decision that you can make, and many of you do, fleetingly, but you can decide right now where your power lies in each and every moment to simply cut yourself at least that much slack.

Again, unconditionally loving yourself allows you to express yourself fully and effortlessly and allows you to make decisions that are consistent with the understanding of who you know yourself to be rather than out of guilt and obligation, which is someone else's version, perhaps, of who you should be and your agreement to that particular decision.

Entertain the idea that when you unconditionally love yourself, you are maximally effective, and by convention, you then give yourself the framework in which to unconditionally love others as well. This means you do not need to agree with their approach, nor do you need to agree with their decisions, but at least you can validate them as a valid set of decisions with a valid set of outcomes, which is true for them. The ultimate truth is composed of all truths anyway, so in invalidating someone else's truth, that invalidates yourself.

How to Make Life Effortless

Creating your reality is a lot of fun, but what makes it really fun is knowing that it can be effortless. That's what we will talk about in this chapter. We will help you understand what it means to allow purposefully so that your life can be effortless.

In order to understand this more clearly, we want to remind you how your reality is created. We have already discussed quite a bit about how you create your reality 100%. The bottom line is that reality exists within you; you don't exist within a reality. When you grow in this physical reality, you expand your consciousness and literally transform into more of yourself.

The more you grow, the more you also realize that your consciousness is the reality. Your physical life represents this, and it plays out in a very specific way in your day-to-day interactions.

1. You decide who you are: "I am this person."
2. You then decide to trust in that decision, no matter what the criteria are for having come to that decision. Whether reality seems to support or contradict your decision, you continue to decide, "I am this person."
3. And lastly, you act. Those actions are an outward expression of who you have decided to be, and they seem to move the reality around and create an effect. The action seems to be the cause.

Creating Reality Is Effortless

Creating your reality and expressing yourself is really easy. It is automatic and effortless. While many people believe that you must make things happen, force things to move, and push really hard in order to have an impact, that is inaccurate.

You don't need to force your reality in order to change it. It is always changing. If you want to be more accurate, what you do is allow. You let go. You allow your reality to be what it is. That is effortless.

If, however, you do this unconsciously or without purpose, then what you are doing is allowing reality to change on its own, and it will seem random. It is, of course, reflecting your own lack of purpose. This, too, is effortless.

So, if you want to change your reality, deliberately and consciously follow the three steps of decision, trust, and action. Reality will then effortlessly change to match you. You don't need to make your reality change. You allow it to change.

When you push, or force, you are tightening up, contracting, and seeming to need to gather yourself in order to explode outwardly. Effortlessly, or allowing, is letting the outcome of any idea happen naturally. Even when it comes to deciding who you want to be, you do that effortlessly. You allow that to happen.

Allow Yourself to Be You

You don't need to force yourself to change your decisions. You simply allow yourself to be who you already are as opposed to forcing yourself to be someone you are not.

The reality exists within you. You are infinite potential in human form. If you want to express some part of who you are, you don't have to flex your muscles or push hard. You simply have to let yourself reflect and express the choices that you have made.

You can allow yourself across the board. You can allow yourself to decide who it is you wish to be. You can also allow yourself to be who you already are, as opposed to someone you are not. Just simply understanding this may be the key that will allow you to do that.

Allow Yourself to Decide Consciously

Even when it comes to deciding who you are, you basically have two choices: you can decide consciously because you say so, or you can let circumstances decide. Either way, you allow yourself to choose who you are.

You can allow yourself to be whoever you wish to be simply because you contain it all. You can allow yourself to trust in that. And you can allow yourself to act like that person. All of this is effortless if you allow it.

If you step back and think about this whole process, it starts with you allowing yourself to decide who you wish to be. You allow yourself the slack to have your decision be a statement of who you are. You don't need to force yourself.

It is up to you. You already know who it is you wish to be and how you want to express yourself. It doesn't even matter if you sometimes express yourself in that way and other times you don't. In either case, you can allow yourself to remind yourself who you are. You can decide consciously.

Your Reality May Seem the Same

One really important point that we want to discuss in more detail is that when you change your decision, reality may not appear to change. Reality has actually changed, but you are interpreting it in older ways that don't reflect your new decision, and so it may appear, at first, to be the same.

Even though you might have made an empowered decision about yourself, such as "I am this integrated, positively oriented person," reality may seem to contradict that. When that happens, you may end up saying, "Well, look at that! If I was that person, this wouldn't be happening." You decide that your first decision didn't stick because "Look! Here's the evidence!"

This is important to understand if you want things to be effortless. Though your society often says that "seeing is believing," "believing is seeing." What you believe is what you see. When you change your decision, your initial interpretation of what is going on may have you thinking that things have not changed. The fact that things seem to be the same tells you that you are not seeing through the eyes of your new decision.

Your Response

This all comes back to something that we talked about in a previous chapter, and that is the concept of your response ability. What we described was that when you look at the world around you, when you look at the people, and when you look at the interactions, the first that you do is interpret them. You make a decision about what is going on and what you are seeing. Based upon your interpretation, you respond. You act in a certain way.

What we suggested was that you pause before you act, remind yourself of who you decided to be, think about how that person would act if they were in your shoes, and then act that way.

Allow Whatever Interpretation You Have

This is where allowance comes in. Once you make a decision, you may see things in an older way. You may have a negative reaction and a negative interpretation, feeling that things are not the way you want. To compensate for that, you might deny or ignore that interpretation. You may try to pretend that you are being positive when you are not.

When you do this, you are not allowing yourself to express yourself fully. Allow yourself to have whatever interpretation you might have. Your first interpretation might very well be from an old belief. That's okay. It's all well and good. Allow yourself to feel that interpretation. Don't pretend to think something that you're not.

When you attempt to squash that interpretation, you are not allowing yourself to express yourself fully. You make things more difficult for yourself. You are not allowing the positive change you seek.

If you ignore your interpretation and simply do something else, that can create a pressure-building effect or frustration within you. In the end, you may end up thinking that you are simply fooling yourself and not changing your reality at all. What you are really doing is suffocating yourself. You are not allowing yourself to be you. That feels increasingly uncomfortable and frustrating.

Allow the Interpretation, but Don't Respond

What we are trying to emphasize is that it is all right, all well and good, and it is, in fact, part of the process to fully allow yourself, at least internally without taking action, to have whatever interpretation or reaction that you have. Do not squelch it. Do not squash it.

Allow Yourself to be You

When you are not honest with yourself about how you are feeling, then you cannot receive the message that that feeling is trying to tell you. That message is trying to guide you toward reinforcing your decision. The negative interpretation is telling you that you are failing to interpret your reality through your new decision. You deny your reaction. You deny yourself in many ways. You deny the opportunity to realign to your new decision. You make things harder.

Don't Judge Yourself

When you deny your interpretation, you are basically judging yourself rather than simply allowing yourself to experience it. When you do that, you make it last longer. It can last days, weeks, or months.

You don't have to assume that that negative interpretation is an interruption or a sign that you're failing. It is not evidence against your decision. Your negative reaction is simply the result of subtle things that your decision is evoking, and they have a shelf life.

Allow yourself to have a reaction even if it does not seem like the most integrated reaction. Just don't act. It will play out, generally in a matter of seconds or minutes, perhaps hours, but generally not much longer.

Allow It to Play Out

If, however, you decide that your interpretation is extraneous, judge it to be backsliding, decide that it is not who you want to be, and then further judge yourself for even having created it, you are not allowing it to play out. You are not assuming that it is actually part of your process. You are not allowing it to deliver the message that it is trying to tell you.

Remember, everything in physical reality is a symbol and a message. You can use that interpretation to see what you must be believing, and then you can pivot, realign, reorient, and remind yourself who you are.

Responding Fully Can Be Okay

When we say do not act immediately, we do not mean in any way, shape, or form that you should not also allow the full response. Sometimes you may end up responding with that negative interpretation. Look at it dispassionately. Maintain your unconditional self-love. Allow even that response to reinforce your new decision. Don't assume that it's evidence against your decision. This is how you keep things effortless rather than fighting yourself.

To state this differently, what we are saying is that you can have an interpretation and a response to that interpretation. You can fully allow yourself to feel it and fully allow it to play out.

You don't have to walk around performing actions with that negative foundation. Just do it in such a way that you are not having negative conversations with others or the world saying and doing things that do not represent who you now are.

Remember: Allow It to Play Out

You can be with yourself and with that response. If it is a negative response and you allow it to play out, it plays out. You get "Alright. Now what?" But if you interfere with it by adding more levels of judgment and self-beratement to it, it stretches out. It doesn't have the opportunity to be part of the process. You end up deciding that it is an interruption and that your decision is nullified. From that point, you generally end up spiraling back downward to the completely disempowered point of view. That, by the way, is also a decision.

"This stuff doesn't work!"

You may not believe that things can be easy and effortless. The fact is that when you say, "This stuff doesn't work," you're actually using this stuff to provide the evidence. From my way of looking at it, it is a paradox and, perhaps, no judgment intended, an irony.

That's because, basically, what you are saying is that you're not powerful enough for things to be easy and effortless. At the same time, you are using the very power to prove you don't have the power. That's how all-powerful you are. You are so powerful that you can actually create the experience that you are completely powerless. That's ironic to us.

I know that a lot of what I say may sound like wordplay. You may even say, "Elan, you are very clever with your words!" The thing is, if that is your decision, that's the effect you will get. What I'm saying will just sound like clever words.

You can, however, entertain the idea that no matter what, you will make a decision, that decision will stick, you will trust that decision, and you will act as though that decision is so.

This will help you realign and remind yourself that you are still using this mechanism.

Purposefully Allow

Everything can be effortless. You can decide to live with purpose and have your decision be purposeful; then, you can also easily allow your reality to express itself and include purpose and fulfillment.

Unconditional Love

In taking all of this one step further, we can talk about love, specifically unconditional love. This is also something that can come effortlessly, and you can allow it or perhaps disallow it. Unconditional love, by definition, is love that is not contingent on any behavior nor any particular outcome.

Love is literally the stuff that reality is made of. It is literally what you may refer to in your vernacular as the love of God or “all that is.” True and pure love is simply knowing that everything exists within you, is a part of you, may reflect the things that you desire, and even the things that you don’t, but it is all still you. Unconditional love is simply expressing that everything has the right and reason to exist and belong.

That does not remove your sense of discernment. That does not remove your sense of approving or disapproving of certain ideas. You still understand that they are valid but just not relevant to you. You can allow yourself to approve or disapprove without invalidating.

Judgment

Unconditional love and conditional love are both things that you allow. You get to choose. The point is that you can effortlessly unconditionally love yourself if you allow it.

Judgment, on the other hand, is a very strong form of conditional love, and it is also something that you allow. When you judge yourself, you and only you, allow that judgment. That is also a matter of allowance. You cannot judge yourself unless you allow yourself to judge yourself.

One way to look at judgment is that you are intermittently loving yourself. “If I do this, I love me. If I don’t do this, I’m an idiot.”

There is no external council, panel, group, or consciousness that judges you. There may be individuals who seem to judge you, but that is simply their external reflection of self-judgment. Rather than judging themselves directly, they create an external symbol, and if you buy into that and agree with them, it is you.

You will only feel judged, no matter what the external appearance is, when you join in on the party, when you match their vibration of external judgment.

You can only feel the negative effect of something that someone is sharing with you if you match that vibration within yourself. You are not feeling their feelings; you are feeling your feelings. Judgment is not something you feel from the outside. Judgment is something you create a version of and then strongly identify with.

But if you do not join in, if you do not judge yourself, if you do not place the conditions on yourself, if you allow unconditional self-love, then anything that anyone else offers to you is simply a gift with the receipt to return it. Either it applies to you, and you keep it, or it doesn't, and you don't, period.

If it seems like someone is judging you, you can refuse to join in. You can insist on unconditional self-love, and you will not feel that judgment. In fact, you may actually feel deep compassion for the other person because you can see how much he must be judging himself.

When you judge someone else, you create negative feelings. That's because when you judge, you create that same feeling within yourself. Your negative opinion feels bad to you.

In the end, since everything is you, judging others is judging yourself. In a sense, in order to avoid responsibility and ownership of things you don't like, you create others as an external symbol and place the judgment on them.

For example, if you don't feel abundant and you judge yourself for not being abundant, you might blame someone else. You might say, "The reason I am poor is because he won't give me more money. He is not nice."

If you want to allow unconditional love and unconditionally love yourself fully, then remind yourself of this when you find yourself doing something that is not an accurate expression of who you have decided to be. Use those opportunities to realign.

Self-Love

Part of expressing self-love is to cut yourself the slack to allow yourself to have responses, to allow yourself to seem to have a reaction. Stop fighting yourself, and effortlessly allow yourself to feel what you feel. Acknowledge it.

If you do not act or express these reactions, you will not create an outer echo reflection of it. Whatever ramifications you might have had will be internal. When you do that, you allow them to play out effortlessly. They resolve. You then easily realign to who it is that you know yourself to be.

You can use your reactions to reinforce who you are. Absolutely refuse to change your decision about who you are, no matter what. Once you have realigned and those interpretations have played out, then you can act, speak, or do whatever is appropriate. When you do this, you have not squelched anything, nothing has built up, and there is no pressure or frustration.

Leave the Room If You Have To

At first, you may be excusing yourself from the room a lot. But that is all well and good because it is an action that others can see, and while they may scratch their heads, when you come back in realigned, you will be an example to them. They will see that when a person makes the decision and allows themselves to maintain that decision, purposefully, nothing can change that. Your actions reflect who you are. You are a living example.

Of course, it is not that you are in any way responsible for them, but you are being responsible to them by being an honest reflection of who you are. While they may see you as you being rude and leaving the room, they will learn to appreciate what you are doing because they will realize that what you are doing is sticking to and maintaining your positive decision.

Your Response Is a Message to Realign

Where this all leads is that you make things more difficult for yourself when you negate your responses, judge them, and then create guilt, which is a lack of self-love. Instead, use them, and then they will deliver their message.

This is particularly important in regard to feeling bad and your negative emotions because your society has a tendency to avoid or negate them. Denying them is not self-love. It's denying who you are.

Allow yourself to have your full range of responses. Use even your negative emotions as opportunities to realign and grow. Of course, you can deny them, but they will keep coming back because you are not allowing the message they are trying to deliver. They are trying to tell you something.

When you effortlessly allow them, they play out. They reinforce your new decision, and they disappear.

Repetitive Responses

If you find that in certain situations, you keep responding in the same way, it's maybe because you're not allowing your response. Your response serves a purpose. When you accept it, you are allowing it to deliver a message. When the message is delivered, the messenger has no reason to hang around.

Many people think that if they want to live a life of positivity that they have to deny their negativity. That is not the case. It is not a matter of constantly “fooling yourself” that things have changed. Instead, allow yourself to fully express yourself and trust that you have changed. Use everything in your reality to reinforce the change. When you do that, your response changes. It becomes dated and obsolete. When you allow yourself to be negative and use it, the negativity will disappear. When you don’t do that, you may feel like you’re fighting yourself and trying to restrain yourself.

Nothing Is Extraneous

What we are saying is that when you first change your decision, it often may not seem like it. “There’s that reaction again. I thought I had changed. I thought I was an unconditionally loving being. Here I am, an idiot again!”

Change is a process that you allow. When you allow things to seem extraneous, you deny the change. When I interact with your society, I often have to remind you that nothing is extraneous. If you are experiencing something, then that is your opportunity to explore it. That is the time.

See what it is. See what it is telling you. It is serving you and guiding you toward being more of who you are. Everything is part of the process. Nothing is an interruption unless you say so, and when you do that, you create the apparency of being interrupted, and you create the appearance of something out of sync with the process.

The paradox and the irony are that it is part of the process. When you continue to label it extraneous, you do not allow yourself to see how it is part of the process. You say, “Oh well, extraneous things happen,” which is another version of a statement you have that I will not repeat.

Relax, Let Go, and Experience

In order to make things effortless, allow, let go, and relax. Experience things and accept that while they may, on the surface, seem to run contrary to your new decision, they don’t. The moment you make the decision, you effortlessly allow the decision to be who you are, and your reality shifts immediately. Everything becomes a reflection of your new decision, no matter what. But that’s only if you choose to interpret it that way.

If you understand that nothing is extraneous, then everything becomes useful. When something comes along that would not seem to be useful, and your first reaction is, “What possible use can this have in my reality,” by all means, allow yourself to feel that. Allow yourself to get righteously indignant. Allow yourself to think, “Always me!”

But, when it plays out, ask yourself, “How does this serve me? How does this reinforce my decision? How is it actually allowing me to see where I still may have the old approach so that I stop expressing it?”

Allow Yourself to Cave In

One of the things that can happen when you apply what we are saying is that after you've made a decision, something comes along that seems like absolute evidence that your decision didn't stick, and then you "cave in." You then reassume a decision, generally a less empowered one. Nevertheless, you are always performing these steps automatically and effortlessly.

Allow yourself to "cave in." Caving in is not something that happens to you, no matter what the apparency is. If you express that belief, you generally resist caving in. What we are suggesting is to allow yourself to cave in. Even caving in can be used. Even caving in has a shelf life when you allow it, and it seems to extend itself when you resist it. Perhaps a rule of thumb is that allowance creates instantaneous expression, and resistance seems to stretch out expression.

Nothing Is Too Overwhelming

There is often the idea that something could come along that is so overwhelming that, if you allow it, you will simply explode. I submit to you that this is an apparency, and it is actually the fear of the fear that you are feeling rather than the idea itself.

If you are afraid to be afraid, that is vastly different. That is another layer altogether rather than simply feeling the fear, allowing yourself to feel the fear, and then having a dialogue with yourself about how it serves you and how it reinforces your new decision rather than negates it.

Align to Your Decision

You can purposefully allow. It is all a matter of choice. If you allow your life to be random, then it is always because you are deciding, “Alright, I give up. Life is random.” Nevertheless, your decision is still registered. Since this may be something that you are used to doing, reality will seem to very quickly support your disempowered decision.

When you change to a positive decision, allow the interpretations to be part of that decision. Refrain from action until you are able to use your interpretations to realign to who you are. Then perform actions consciously, purposefully, and ably, and you will see a change.

Loosen Up

Let me mention one more thing as a reminder. Since you are linear beings, if you consistently maintain your positive decision about who you are, you can make changes very quickly in your life. If you do so consistently without fail for about 3 days, there will be noticeable evidence.

We don’t say this as a challenge to you. And, we don’t say it to set up the atmosphere, “Oh! Show me! I can do that for 3 days! Prove it to me,” because the very posture of “prove it to me” actually has an underlying assumption that it is not likely true. As a result, you will respond and interpret the evidence as supporting the idea that it is not likely true.

Try loosening up on the time frame. You will see changes, but not if you focus on evidence to the opposite. In that case, the changes that do occur will not be apparent to you, although they may be to others around you.

You don't need to test your reality. Up till now, your reality has been a marvelous exam. If you challenge the universe, "Show me," I remind you, the universe is you. A challenge has an underlying supposition that failure is very possible.

Everyone Sees Things Differently

Although you may think you all see the same words on this page, I guarantee you there are as many interpretations of what I am writing as there are individuals present, both physically and non-physically.

You experience your version of your reality. The things that you notice in a string of words you call a "sentence" are contingent on your approach, on the things that stand out to you, on the way that you have expressed what you call your "tastes," your desires, and your particular approach, and your particular evidence-gathering.

Therefore, when I interact with you and when we as a society interact with you, we do so putting out an overall intention and then allowing our particular message to serve as many purposes as it will, no matter what the outcome is, with no investment in anyone embracing or rejecting any of it.

Share and Allow

My responsibility to myself is to share what I know to be true for me and trust that whoever I attract is just the individual that will benefit from it. That is the extent of my involvement.

How you interpret it, how you use it, if you use it or not consciously is not of importance to me. I honor you as a being, as a sovereign consciousness that makes your own decisions, no matter what those decisions are.

For members of my society and me, disempowered decisions are still an expression of your overwhelming power. We find fascination in any decision.

Your responsibility is to interpret this in whatever way you are, trust that you have attracted things for a reason, if you wish to, and use it in whatever way you see fit, unless you wish not to use it at all, in which case alright. Ironically, you'll be using it anyway.

Allow Other People to Be Themselves

When you allow other individuals to have their own interpretations, allow those interpretations to be valid for them without taking them on yourself, all the while remaining minded and grounded in who you are, you will allow your decision to seem to register a visible effect. If you depend on the reactions, the responses, the interpretations, the evidence, and the belief expression of others, all you are doing is using those others as a symbol, as a relief valve, for your own decisions and your own beliefs anyway. So, they only act as mirrors, whether you create those mirrors to be shiny and true or smoky and dark.

Responsible “To” Not “For”

Responsibility to is simply being who you are. Responsibility for is then taking on the added responsibility to make sure everyone else gets it, which is completely impossible. Remembering this allows you to let go. It allows everyone to have their own point of view. It allows you to maintain your own.

Allow Reality to Unfold

As you consciously decide who you are, because that is what you say and that is who you know you are, your reality shifts immediately, instantaneously, and completely in the moment of that decision.

Allow everything from that point forward to be part of the process and see how it reinforces your decision. Don't look to see how something is interfering, but instead, see how it reinforces your decision. That allows your decision to be reinforced more quickly.

We All Reflect Each Other

Although interacting with us may seem one-sided at this point, a dialogue takes place, and the dialogue is, in a sense, as though we are a room full of mirrored balls, all reflecting off each other from different facets and different directions. When you catch the light from others, that allows you to reinforce who you are. The light of others may not be a reflection of who you are, but it does help you define who you are. And so, everything is of service.

When we interact with you, this is what we get out of it. We get the reflections that assist us with our particular point of view and with our particular orientation. The gift that you give us, whether or not we so-called “speak,” is a great gift that is held by members of my society in high regard.

By allowing you to be you, we also honor ourselves. In this “honoring fest,” we all gain, and we all learn things about ourselves that allow us to expand.

It truly is an interaction and not a one-sided event. Everyone is both teacher and learner. Everyone. If you begin to allow yourself to see this, you will know when it is your turn to contribute. You will know when it is your turn to gather, and to reflect, and to define.

Summary: Purposefully Allow

If you wish, you may now purposefully allow that your decision has registered and that everything “from this moment forward,” as you say, is a reinforcement of your decision, no matter what has ever happened to you up to this point. Your past, or your perception of your past, which is often inaccurate, is one of your greatest rationalizations for continuing to make decisions in the present that are not empowering and not representative of who you say you wish to be.

The past served its purpose in the moment that it occurred. In the now moment that any event has occurred, it's over. If you insist on bringing it into this moment, it is not the past, it is a recreation in the moment using elements, using puzzle pieces, from seemingly other things, but you are creating it right now. The past has no hold on you unless you rigidly and completely insist that it does, and then you will create the apparency that it does.

I remind you that you are now in the moment. You now create in the moment, and it is up to you how you will continue to express yourself. Nothing is kept from you if you will but purposefully allow yourself to experience it.

How to Find Your Path

One of the things that people ask us a lot is, “What is my path? What should I do? What is my purpose?” Fortunately, this is a simple question to answer. Your purpose is whatever excites you. Your path is whatever excites you the most in any given moment. To understand why this is the case and so that you can buy into that idea more fully, we have to give you some background.

Fundamentally you are a consciousness. Your physical life, your physical expression, and your linear reality experience are statements and expressions of your consciousness. In fact, you are so good at creating your linear existence, and you wrap yourself so firmly within time and space that you actually forget that you are pure consciousness.

You have forgotten that you created this physical reality. You do not have a consciousness; instead, you are a consciousness expressing yourself in physical and linear terms.

The way your consciousness creates reality is in the following way. In each and every moment, you decide who you are, you trust that decision, and you act as though you trust that decision. Your actions reflect whoever you have decided that you are, and that creates the face of your life.

Excitement Is Your Guidance

You have a built-in mechanism you can use to choose from what is available in any given moment, and that is your excitement. We have written about excitement many times. When we ask people, “What do you think excitement actually is,” they generally describe the emotion, the sensations, and the physical characteristics of excitement, but what we actually are asking is, “What causes you to feel excited? Where is that excitement coming from?”

The answer is that excitement is a sense that tells you that of anything that is available in front of you, the thing that excites you the most and that you can express with integrity is the strongest choice. It is the choice that is most aligned with who you choose to be.

That’s why it excites you. That’s why it invokes within you the vibrational feeling of being motivated, inspired, and passionate. Excitement is not there to tease you. It is not a random emotional response. It is your inner core expressing in no uncertain terms, “of these choices, this choice is ‘most me.” As you say in your vernacular, you feel “most stoked” about it.

Clarifying What Excitement Means

There are some details about excitement that are useful to know. Often people will ask either each other or us, “What is my purpose in life?” This seems to be a very popular subject that you discuss: “my purpose.” Your purpose is whatever excites you the most. More specifically, it is your overall purpose.

The thing that stands out as being most exciting, most motivating, and most inspiring creates passion. The reason that it does is because it is why you created yourself as a physical being to begin with. At the same time, if there is one thing overall that excites you, that does not mean it is your entire purpose. It is a focus function of your purpose. It helps you focus.

Allow me to explain. The thing that excites you the most is an not the overall purpose in your life. There is also a moment-to-moment aspect of this. In each and every given moment, there are choices available that seem unique to that moment. There are different choices than you’ve ever had, different choices than you seem to have just had, and different choices than you will have in but a moment’s time. By definition, in linear reality, in each and every moment, there is a set of choices unique to that moment. Of those choices, there will always be one or perhaps more than one, but a finite number of them, that will stand out as being more compelling, more exciting. This is also your purpose.

What Excites You Now and Overall

Your overall purpose is the combination of the thing that seems to excite you the most and anything that excites you the most of what's available in any given moment.

Often these two things, the overall thing and the idea of the thing in the moment that is most exciting can seem completely unrelated. In fact, one may actually seem to be a sidetrack of the other. What allows you to understand that they are not opposed or contradictory is the common thing they share: excitement.

Excitement Is Your Path

What I am getting at is that whatever excites you that you can act on with integrity in the moment, no matter whether it seems to have anything to do with the overall thing that excites you the most, is absolutely essential for the thing that excites you the most or it wouldn't excite you. The excitement itself tells you, "Of anything that is available to me right now that I can act on with integrity, this is the most representative of who I am. Therefore, this is an expression of the purpose of my whole entire life." You can use the excitement as a tool of alignment.

Integrity

We have mentioned several times in this chapter the idea of acting on that excitement with integrity. Allow me to explain a little bit more concisely what I mean by integrity. Allow me to start by saying what I do not mean. Integrity is not the moralistic tone that the term can mean. If you interpret integrity as a sense of given morals, then you can easily see that integrity can vary across the board. The morals of the different factions of your society can sometimes be completely contradictory. There is no true underlying moralistic integrity that is the integrity for everyone.

What we mean by integrity is the understanding that you are consciousness, an infinite consciousness expressing yourself as a physical being. Therefore, everything you experience as a physical reality exists within you, and is one thing with you, is an expression of you. Integration is the idea that everything is all one thing, everything is interrelated, and that you are expressing that idea through your very consciousness.

Reality is one integrated whole that you are expressing within you. Acting with integrity is expressing yourself as a being that is mindful that everything is an expression of you, that everything is an extension of you, and that everything is a reflection from you and to you. The attitude that accompanies that knowingness is a certain respect or validation for what is going on. When your actions reflect that validation, they take on a positive tone.

It may seem this definition of integrity creates a moral structure, but that is not what we mean when we say it. When we say “act with integrity,” we mean to act with the underlying understanding that your reality is an integrated whole and treat everything with the same respect as you would demand yourself because it is all you. Reality seems external, but it is you. When you interact with reality, treat it the way you would treat yourself.

Excitement with Integrity

If you look at the choices that you have available, you will see that if something stands out as being exciting, either you can act on it with integrity or not. If you can, you will be expressing the knowingness, the compassion, and the unconditional lovingness that you yourself would wish to receive. If not, then acting at this time would clearly be out of your integrity.

This is a very important distinction in following your excitement. If you factor out the integrity, you can create the idea you refer to as “running amok.” If you factor in the integrity, you are always acting from your center, using the feedback of the discernment of excitement to allow you to see who you are in the situation and then acting as an integrated being, expressing that excitement in physical terms.

Factoring in Excitement

What we mean by “factoring in excitement” is to use your excitement and your ability to act on it with integrity as a tool to assist you in any given moment to formulate and reestablish or restate your decision. When your decision is, “I am a being that expresses myself fully, with integrity, with unconditional lovingness to myself and others because that is a function of integrity,” then you will understand that the output of such an attitude is always only positive.

Whether that action seems like the societal norm or not, it will only add to you, your experience, and any other individual who comes in contact with you because it is an expression of who you are in the most positive of terms.

Using Excitement Is Easy

Using your excitement is quite easy. You can always easily discern what excites you if you simply say, “Alright. This is a moment. This is a moment with unique choices. Here are what the choices are. This one, and this one, and this one, stand out as being the most exciting. This one that is most exciting does not appear that I can act on it with integrity, so I’ll push that aside. These two appear that I can act on them with integrity. I have two, but one of them is immediately available.” When you choose with excitement and integrity among the immediately available options, you are also factoring in the timing.

Excitement Is a Barometer

What we are introducing is literally a barometer of who you are, both overall in the thing that excites you the most and in the moment to moment to moment to moment focus on what is available. The things that stand out are obviously more compelling.

We bring this up to put, as you say, “the icing on the cake” of understanding that although you may express yourself in many, many, many, many ways as infinite beings through physical means, you actually have the option to express yourself naturally, flowingly, joyfully, purposefully, effectively, and productively, while still honoring who you are to the greatest degree.

You Are a Light to Others

In not denying who you are and fully expressing who you are, you become the greatest service to other people, who will use you as a reflection in their consciousness from what they are exploring. This allows people to say, “Yes, I understand that I can function randomly with haphazard results, but also, I see people who function purposefully with positive results, not necessarily always what they expect but positive nevertheless.”

You do yourself the greatest service by expressing who you are with, as you say, “no holds barred.” You do everyone else the greatest service because in expressing yourself that clearly, you allow them the opportunity, not that they need to, but that they have attracted you for a reason, to see an example, an expression of clarity, of purposefulness, and of joyfulness.

Always, in any given moment, it can be as completely obvious as you say, “as the nose on your face,” which of the options stands out as being most exciting and that you can act on with integrity.

You Always Know What Excites You

One last thing. People will sometimes play “the shell game” with their overall excitement. In other words, they may say, “Well... I don’t really know what excites me.” Allow me to say that this is never the case. Perhaps you have allowed yourself to be talked out of what excites you. Perhaps you have taken the weight of the words of others and made the decision that what excites you is not valid or important. But always, always, always, you and only you know what truly excites you the most.

When I say this, this will generally turn the key for many people to say, “Well, alright. Yes, I do know what excites me, and I had not wanted to acknowledge it because then I might have to do something about it.”

The Magic Lamp

Nonetheless, there still are people who will play the next layer of the shell game and say, “Well, I still can’t even determine what excites me at all.” Allow me to offer up the following tool for these people: the “magic lamp.” Simply ask yourself, “If I had a lamp and could rub it and wish to be the person I truly wish to be, who would I be?”

Often with the idea of the miracle of the magical genie in the lamp, you will allow yourself to drop your guard, drop the excuses, and truly put before you what it is that excites you the most, with “no holds barred.” Then you can look at it and test it to see, “Well, yes, this does really excite me. It doesn’t seem like something I can really do necessarily, and that’s why I couldn’t acknowledge it, but it does excite me.”

You will find that the moment you validate what is truly the most exciting thing for you, your attitude will shift, and you will begin to entertain the idea, “Well, no one has ever said I could ever do this, but perhaps, just perhaps, maybe it is possible.” That is the beginning. Deciding to be excited and allowing yourself to be excited. At this point, you can better factor into your decision the moment to moment to moment excitement.

You Can Build the Excitement

When a circumstance or a series of choices comes along, and you are conscious about it, you will say, “Alright. I am this person. I am this type of person,” and whatever parameters you plug into that. When you notice what excites you the most, you can embellish that decision to include the idea of the thing that excites you: “I am this particular person who likes to do this particular thing.” The excitement allows you to further define and hone in on who it is you are.

At first, it may seem as though you are seeking and searching for what excites you. “Alright. From these choices, which excites me? Which excites me here? Which excites me now? Which excites me now?” But this is only because you have denied yourself this vibration as being frivolous for so long.

Once you begin to consciously decide, to discern what excites you from the choices available, and begin to do this consistently, you will find it will become quite automatic. You will simply know, “Oh! There’s the exciting thing. I don’t even need to know the other choices.”

Connecting the Dots Creates the Picture

When you follow your excitement, you create a moment to moment to moment connecting of the dots that all together creates the picture of the most exciting thing. Though one particular set of dots and lines between them may appear to have nothing to do with the overall exciting thing, when you step back and look at the whole picture, those dots and the lines that connect them were essential. The picture would be incomplete without them. That is when it becomes more evident that certain things that excite you in the moment, that you can act on with integrity, are actually related to the most exciting thing, no matter what the apperency is.

Remember the Lamp

If it is necessary, if you are denying to yourself what it is that truly excites you, rub the lamp, make a wish, watch for what you wish for, and learn more about who you are by seeing what you choose.

Only You Know You

Only you know you. If someone else tells you who you are, and you then fulfill that prophecy by being their version of who you are, it is not because they have defined you. It is because, at some point in some given moment, you decided to agree with their assessment. In trusting that decision and acting that way, you put out the expression that seems to confirm, “They were right. They knew me better than I knew myself.” But that, I remind you, is not possible.

You know you the best. Your excitement is your number one key to knowing who you are and to allowing choices to stand out in relief of the rest of the choices in a very obvious and serendipitous way.

If you are willing to factor in your excitement, then the process of conscious self-expression becomes immediately fun, immediately joyful, immediately exciting, and invigorating, and—do not miss this point, unless you wish—immediately productive, no matter what anyone else says. You will connect more dots as you begin to do this to make it more apparent that you are being productive by acting on who you know yourself to be in each and every moment rather than someone else’s version of who they think you are.

This is the way that we function as beings, though quite automatically. We simply have this approach and do not even give it any thought, as you will not once it simply becomes, as you say, “old hack.”

We Are Excited to Interact with You

The main reason that we interact with members of your society is the mere fact that it excites us. We understand from our point of view that you are an expression of us. You are a reflection to me of my consciousness. When you say something, particularly that I do not expect, I immediately learn more about myself.

Hello

Since one of my purposes is to know as much about myself as possible, I find this quite exciting. I thank you for allowing me to express my excitement and the collective excitement of the members of my civilization in this, perhaps you would call it, "quite an unconventional manner."

Reality Reflects Who You Actually Are

Sometimes when you look at the world around you, you may wonder, “What the heck is going on?” Even though you made a clear intention and feel that you have acted in line with that, things are not going the way you expect. When this happens, you can use the feedback from your reality as guidance. What you are seeing will tell you what you’re thinking and what you ultimately truly believe.

As we have described already, you are pure consciousness expressing yourself in linear terms and as a physical being. You do so, so convincingly, you actually believe it. Very creative.

You use a particular mechanism to focus your consciousness so that you can experience yourself as a physical being in a physical world. From our perspective, you are all of these things, and they actually exist within you, but you feel like you exist within a reality.

In each and every moment, you focus your consciousness in a series of steps:

1. You decide who you are.
2. You trust or invest in a consistency in having that decision stick.
3. You then act. Action is your most accepted notion of what creates physicality.

The moment you decide who you are, you automatically create yourself to be that person across the board, no matter what. It doesn't matter what reality may seem like; you have changed completely. When you change your decision, your reality seems to change as well. What you decide is who you are being. When you subsequently trust in that decision and remain focused and conscious about it, your actions then reflect that decision. Your actions produce an effect that is consistent with that decision in the way that you create your physical life.

Your Reality Is Feedback

The point of all this is that your reality is actually you, but it can look like it is external and separate from you. While you may not be aware of it, the reason that you created reality in this way is because it allows you to be able to reflect, contemplate, and do some introspection. One of the ways that you can see that in any given moment is by how your reality reflects to you any idea as feedback.

We use the word reflection because it implies that what comes back to you is always representative of what you have put out, who you are being, and who you have decided that you are. What you perceive as “coming back” is the feedback from your reality. Your reality reflects to you who you are being.

You Interpret That Feedback

Generally speaking, as a simplification, people will interpret the feedback in one of two ways. There are an infinite number of ways that you may actually interpret it, but to illustrate the point, we will simply narrow it down to two. Either you trust that the feedback reinforces your decision, or you trust that the feedback negates or shows evidence contrary to your decision.

If, for example, you have decided that you are abundant, and your wallet doesn't have any cash in it, you can interpret that in many ways. You can interpret it as a sign that you are not abundant: no cash means you are not abundant. Or you can interpret it as a sign that you are abundant: no cash means that you are so abundant you can survive just fine with an empty wallet. You can interpret it in either way and many more.

How you interpret the feedback from your reality is ultimately what allows you to either maintain your decision or to be strayed back to a more disempowered, older decision. It is all an illusion, but that interpretation is up to you.

See All Feedback as Supporting You

This all boils down to you using whatever you see as coming back to you in the form of feedback as a reinforcement and as evidence that your decision has stuck. You use the feedback to show yourself that your decision has, in fact, been registered and is who you are. This can take a bit of persistence, and a bit of consistency, before you actually prove to yourself that all feedback, no matter what it appears to be, always reinforces your decision. Especially at first, you might not see how something you have so consistently labeled negative can reinforce your decision and support you.

If you have made a conscious decision about who you want to be, allow your decision to reflect who you are. You do this by trusting that your decision has indeed been registered across the board and that the feedback that comes back to you always reinforces your decision, no matter what it looks like. This is in strong contrast to allowing the reality and circumstances to dictate who you are.

Be Persistent and Creative

Now where the ingenuity, the creativity, and the persistence come in is when the feedback appears on the surface to contradict your decision. At that point, you can “make or break” your decision. If reality seems to contradict your decision, you always have the option to simply remind yourself that although it appears that way, no matter what it is, it has to be positive feedback that supports your decision. The thing that you see as negative is not the reason it is there, and instead, that thing is actually proof of the reinforcement.

For example, if you decide that you are loved unconditionally, and people around you seem to be grumpy and mean, you could interpret that as you are unloved. If you see that same situation as supporting your decision that you are loved unconditionally, then you may see that those people are perhaps feeling their own unhappiness in stronger contrast to how happy you are. Or perhaps they are jealous of you, or maybe they're just having a bad day. In any case, you may end up actually feeling compassion for them, realizing that it's not you.

Life Is Like an Improv Performance

All feedback can always be interpreted all the way from the most negative to the most positive. The situations themselves are fundamentally neutral, with no built-in meaning. They are a set of props as if you were in an improv performance. If you attach meaning that is inconsistent with your decision, then it can seem to be evidence that your decision simply did not register or that perhaps you do not create your reality.

If you choose to look further and go beyond the surface by diving in and finding how “even this particular feedback,” though it appears contrary, “has to be supportive of my decision,” you will see how the feedback serves you and reinforces and supports the decision, as opposed to how it refutes it or seems to nullify your decision. Every situation and all feedback contains the ability to either say, “Why is this happening to me,” or “How can this serve me? How does this serve me exactly the way it is?”

When you see things this way, you can use everything, including the seemingly negative evidence, to reinforce your decision, to continue to support yourself, and to fortify the decision itself. Don’t settle for what’s on the surface if feedback seems negative.

Use All Feedback

If you probe further into how that feedback is not only a reinforcement of your decision but essential to occur in order for you to fully express your decision, you will very quickly transform even the apparency of the feedback. When you use all the feedback, no matter what it appears to be on the surface, to reinforce and support your positive decision, then the feedback, the nature of the feedback, and your relationship to the feedback change and transform.

When you are consistent, never allowing the feedback to talk you out of your decision, the result is that you will begin to see the nature of the feedback change. The feedback will no longer even seem on the surface to refute your decision nor will it prove to you that indeed you do not create your reality and are fooling yourself.

The statement “How does this serve me exactly the way it is” is the beginning of using all of yourself to express yourself more fully.

Take Action

I say the first step because the second step is to truly act as though you really are committed to believing that, and that takes the form of—read this carefully—actually genuinely appreciating and thanking the feedback for coming in the way that it has because it has allowed you to look at whatever it is and, therefore, reinforce your decision.

When you are willing, not jokingly, not sarcastically, but sincerely and honestly, to thank the seemingly negative feedback and feel that appreciation, feel that gratitude, then you are truly expressing in action the idea that you are no longer able to be talked out of who you are by anyone, anything, any circumstance, or any relationship period. You have made a conscious decision and realized that those things allow you to express more of yourself.

You Hold You Back

Another way to look at this is that when you decide who you are, simply honor everything that comes your way and use it in a positive way. When you do this, you are literally using more of yourself. You are expressing yourself more fully. You are understanding that you are a creator who is choosing to create a physical experience.

The other limitations you perceive that are holding you back, transform, for nothing, nothing, nothing can hold you back from being who you are, except you. If you fail to be who you want, in the end, no matter what the reason, when you finally agree, “I cannot be who I am,” you are the one ultimately deciding and making the decision. You assume that that decision sticks. “Well, I can’t be who I am,” you trust, “I can’t be who I am,” you act like, “I can’t be who I am,” and then the feedback comes back, very blatantly to reinforce all of that saying, “You are wasting your time trying to creating your reality to begin with.”

You Are Always Deciding

Even then, even should you choose the most disempowered path, you are using your power. You are using this same methodology and way of focusing your consciousness and expressing yourself to actually prove to yourself that you have no power. An irony. You are deciding that you don’t have power and acting like you don’t have power.

Remind yourself that you are always using that power, even when you are expressing it as complete powerlessness. That can sometimes be the key that will allow you in any given moment to laugh at yourself and realign, saying to yourself, “No matter what I do, I’m going to do this anyway. I’m going to decide, I’m going to trust, and I’m going to act. So, if I do so consciously, then my life will be a conscious one.”

It’s All You

Your subconscious can’t have any effect on you because, ultimately, you designate yourself as the decision-maker. When choices come your way from within or without, you are the one who decides, “Yes, I will buy into that,” or “No, I will not.” You, the conscious self, are always the power, the creation, the experience, and the perceiver of the experience. You are more literally both the observer and the observed. It is all one event, all you.

You can’t really get away from yourself, no matter who you talk to, where you go, or what you do. It is all you, reflecting to yourself who you are, in seemingly, a given isolated moment of time. I say “seemingly” because you also have an infinite expression of consciousness, but we will go into that another time.

The feedback from your reality always reinforces who you are and who you have decided to be. If that decision is conscious, purposeful, and pointed, then the feedback has a conscious, purposeful, and pointed reflection, though not always on the surface.

Sometimes what is on the surface may seem to obscure the actual reinforcement. This is where we suggest that you take for granted that nothing is extraneous, that everything is a part of who you are, and that there is nothing that is outside or interrupting. Whatever the circumstance is, it has to contain within it positive reinforcement that you can use to strengthen your resolve, your decision, your trust, and ultimately your action.

Allow Your Response

Let me remind you of something. When you perceive the feedback from your reality to be negative, you generally feel bad. In a previous chapter, we mentioned and suggested that before you take action with that as a negative foundation, you first realign to your positive decision.

One thing that is very important is that you allow yourself to feel what you feel and allow whatever interpretation you may have. Sometimes people have a tendency, especially when they learn that there is a relationship between what they believe and their reality, to ignore or suppress their negative interpretations. They pretend that they don't feel bad when they do.

I would like to re-emphasize that by all means, it is necessary to allow yourself to have whatever the most natural emotional interpretation is. In other words, if your emotional interpretation seems to run contrary to your decision, allow it to run its course and allow yourself to feel that way.

Allow, But Don't Act Until Realigned

We suggest that you do not act or respond outwardly. By all means, express it to yourself and allow yourself to express it fully. When you do, it passes. When you don't, you have the sense that you are squelching yourself, and you have the sense because you are.

It is all well and good to notice "I am having a negative emotion. Alright, I will have it. I understand that I cannot deny anything. This is part of my feedback, and once I allow myself to have it rather than resist having it, the emotion will pass. And then I can realign. I will realign consciously." This is not out of denial of any initial interpretation or reaction that you have.

Therefore, by all means, if feedback appears negative, feel whatever you feel. When you allow yourself to feel it, it will generally resolve itself within a few minutes. Resisting it, saying, “I shouldn’t feel that way. Anyone who is enlightened does not feel that way,” will prolong it, sometimes for a long time.

You don’t need to act and let the negative emotion dictate your outward response, which will have an effect. However, by all means, feel the response, and don’t deny it. The irony is even that negative emotional response—are you reading carefully?—even that negative emotional response reinforces the positive decision, although there is a nuance of an old approach in there.

Allow the Negative, But Trust

Rather than avoiding it, which would have been the older approach, allow yourself to feel it, and then your reaction to that emotion will be different. No matter what your reaction may be to a particular set of feedback, allowing it to play out and then acting after you have realigned to your decision will have all your actions being a reflection of the decision.

Again, another way to put this is that you can use it all. Nothing can talk you out of who you are until you “fall” into an agreement with it. Ultimately, you are deciding who you are on a foundational level. You always start by deciding, “I am this person in this moment.” Whether you say it like that or whether it is automatic, that goes on.

Eventually, It Will Be Automatic

By having it become conscious and living it to be conscious, eventually, there will not even be a tendency to need to even say these things to yourself because you will run on automatic. I understand that sounds paradoxical.

When you get accustomed to doing this, you will find it effortless and automatic to maintain your positive decision. This is especially true when you use any negative feedback, allow it to transform, and start to notice even the feedback is primarily, even on the surface, positive. That is my promise to you.

If you are consistent in using all the feedback that comes back to you that you have formally labeled negative to see how it actually reinforces your decision, then the nature of the feedback will change. You must be consistent because of the way you create yourself as a linear being. The things that seem negative that you need to relabel and look at will seem to recede and almost entirely disappear in your life. They will not generally entirely disappear, and there is a specific reason for that as well, which we will not discuss now.

Conclusion

Thank you for understanding that everything can be viewed as a reinforcement of your decision, though sometimes you need to employ a little ingenuity to see how and why it supports it. Thank you for standing up tall and deciding who you are rather than allowing yourself to be dictated to and letting your decision be reflective of someone else's idea, or perhaps as you say, “they.” You all seem to think that there is this generic “they” that is actually ganging up on you. “They” are not. It is you. It is always up to you to choose who you are rather than have it be dictated to you.

When Things Don't Go As Expected

Sometimes things may not turn out the way that you expect. You may be confused as to why especially if you are deliberately and consciously creating reality. In large part, this may have to do with your timing.

To understand this, let me remind you of some basic ideas. You, in fact, create your life, and one step further, you do, in fact, create your reality. This has become a catchphrase in your society; however, it is accurate. Reality is an experience that you can choose to explore consciously rather than half-consciously and unconsciously. Creating you do, regardless of whether you choose to take the responsibility to do so consciously or not.

Many people might say, "If I created my reality, why would I have created this? I don't want my life to be this way." This is because, for the most part, you have been creating unconsciously.

What we suggest is that you become conscious. Take back the power and responsibility of creating your reality. Create according to preference and integrity. Express who you are in no uncertain terms.

Trust Is Important

Trust plays an important part in creating because you have to trust that you can have what you want. Remember, you always trust in something. Trust means that you are expressing a belief. It is similar to faith.

Trust is not something that you need to build or muster up. When you say that you don't have faith, don't trust, or don't believe, what you are actually saying is that you have faith or trust in the complete opposite.

You always trust in something. In other words, first, identify where you have placed your trust, and then you can see whether or not you want to continue to do that. You can easily shift what you trust and trust in what you want.

Time

When it comes to understanding why your life is the way it is, you have to understand that you created it all. Time plays an important part in how you create because life unfolds in certain timing. Things happen at a particular time for a particular reason.

What you call your reality exists within a time frame. You sometimes speak about "being a soul" or "having a soul." However, being a soul is more accurate. A soul is not something within you; a soul is what you are within. A soul does not reside in your body. You can experience that apparency, but, more accurately, your body resides within your soul.

Your soul, your essence, your Higher Self, or whatever you wish to call it, is infinite, multidimensional, and eternal. It is timeless. It is ageless. It is space-less. In its pristine form, time and space exist within the infinity of your soul, or of your Higher Self. Time and timing are expressions that exist within your soul, which is a timeless creation.

In other words, your life unfolds in a certain way with a certain timing, on purpose. Things may not occur at the time that you think they should.

You Chose to Be Finite

Now, why would you do this? Why would you withhold something from yourself until later? Good question! As an infinite being, you are exploring an infinite number of possibilities. One of those possibilities is to express yourself as a finite being, which has the ability to express itself in multiple ways.

Finite can be defined as “having a beginning, middle, and end.” It is a seeming progression, a seeming beginning starting with so-called “nothing,” acquiring knowledge, acquiring experience, and ending up larger than you began.

Since you are ultimately infinite, this is only one minute-expression within your totality. It is only one choice. When you make that choice, you choose to experience your infinity in a line, in a linear fashion, seemingly, with one thing at a time unfolding. This is what you refer to as “your timeframe.”

You Create Space and Time

When you create space, you are creating a finite idea within the infinity of your being. In order to move across that space, you create time to do so. This is why even scientists understand that rather than space and time being two things, they now refer to them as “space-time.” They are two sides of one coin. When you create a finite experience within that infinite space, you then create time in which to move across it. While you may not be aware of it, this is what you are doing.

Being Limited Has Advantages

You don’t want to know everything and have everything manifest instantly. When you are in your natural state, which is infinite, eternal, multidimensional, and all-knowing, there is something that you cannot do. When you know it all already, you cannot discover or experience things as if it was the first time, which, by the way, is something that many of you say you like.

Consider “surprise.” How could anything surprise you if you always knew what was coming?

One of the fundamental reasons why you create a linear frame of reference is to experience things as if you begin as a blank slate. By elaborately playing amnesia on your all-knowingness, you then can experience things with the joy of discovery and with the apparency of the “first time.”

When you go to the movies, you enjoy not knowing what is going to happen. You don't like spoilers. You get to have the joy of seeing how it will play out from all the possible options. You like seeing how one particular version will play out, and you enjoy being surprised by it. This is one "microcosmic analogy" to your entire life. You want to enjoy unfolding as if you are actually experiencing things for the first time.

You Have Chosen This

Many of you view this as a curse. Hopefully, you can understand that you have chosen this on some level and that that seeming amnesia only exists from where you are sitting and your standpoint right now.

From the perspective of your Higher Self, your soul, your oversoul, or whatever you wish to call it, you already know what you are doing. You are already playing out a set of choices that you have laid down. Nothing occurs that is outside of your consciousness or outside of your being.

Your Point of View Is Very Narrow

Your consciousness is your infinite knowingness. What you refer to on your planet as "your mentality" is your finite version of knowingness. You experience your mentality as an unfoldment. From your perspective, reality seems quite real. It seems like this is the only reality and that this is the only planet with intelligent life. Not true. Your point of view is very narrow. By excluding 99.9999% and so on and so forth of reality, you get to focus on a very fine fractionated portion of your totality.

You may feel that seeing, thinking, hearing, smelling, and feeling one thing at a time is the normal mode of operation, but from your Higher Self perspective, it is a unique experience. Your Higher Self has the ability to understand an infinite number of things at once. “One thing at a time” is actually the exception; rather than the rule. You have created your reality in such a way that it seems like one thing at a time is the rule. You use that ability to focus on one thing at a time. Your Higher Self created this reality to have these types of experiences.

You Are Beginning to Remember

The sense of amnesia you impose on yourself is so pervasive and so all-inclusive that you have conveniently, perhaps some of you will experience that inconveniently, forgotten even why you’re here. Obviously, you are now beginning to allow yourself to effectively lift your amnesia along a timeline by allowing things to unfold a bit at a time. You do this by attracting the resources, such as this book, whatever you read, and whatever else you find yourself attracted to. This is all reflection to yourself through a mirror. I am only a mirror within your own consciousness.

It’s Always Right Here, Right Now

Where this all comes together is that your timing is always impeccable. Impeccable. It cannot be otherwise. It is always that. Where you are right here, right now, the only place and time you ever experience, is always the perfect place in the entirety of your being. I believe this is another little minor fact you may have forgotten.

You often create your reality in such a way that going somewhere seems a whole lot better than being right here. However, you are the one who has determined that right here and right now is not the perfect place and time. When you assign that meaning, needless to say, you get that effect and constantly are you going somewhere, never quite being where you are.

Where you are is always unique. Where you are always has advantages that any other place you seem to go—and I am speaking in your own linear terms—will not contain. Every here and now has a unique advantage. Simply reminding yourself of this is perhaps one of the first steps to seeing or examining what is right in front of your face. Every moment always contains a unique advantage. Remember that, unless you choose to forget.

Identify Where You Place Your Trust

This is why we talk about trust. When I say you are always trusting in something, I mean it. Trust is one of the mechanisms that you use to hold your reality in place. For instance, you may not trust the following statement: “I get what I want.” One way to look at it is that you don’t have faith or trust that you will get what you want. Another more useful way to look at it is that you are trusting that you don’t get what you want.

It is not a matter of building up trust that you do get what you want. It is a matter of identifying and acknowledging where you already place your trust.

In general, many people have some under- or overtone that you get what you are dealt. That is not the only way to look at it. When you look at anything from a particular trust level, you experience the results of that trust. You always get the evidence for whatever you are trusting in. If you trust in “I do not get what I want,” need I say that perhaps some of you will be familiar with some of the results of that type of trust.

In other words, we’re offering you a different approach. Rather than building up through processes, exercises, and mental strain, trust that you do get what you want. If you find that you are not doing that, then first acknowledge where your trust is, and then you can change it.

Trust the Timing

From my experience, which in no way is, in any way, shape, or form, better than your own, simply different, I know that I get what I want; therefore, I get what I want. I know that I will get it if I continue to want it. And I know something else. I know I will not get it one moment sooner than I can handle it and explore it fully. I also know I will not get it one moment later. How refreshing.

The idea is this: Timing can be used to your own advantage. When you “begin to sense that you desire or want something,” obviously, it is either available in that moment that you are thinking and pondering it, or it is not. Plain and straightforward. I think you will agree with me on that one.

If it is available, obviously, it is simply a matter of doing that thing and reaping that result. If it is not available, you get a choice: You can use the fact that it's not available as evidence that it never will be and give up, or you can understand that the fact that it's not available means, even though you may think you are ready for it, obviously, through the feedback of your reality, the universe is telling you: "You may think you're ready for it, but you can enjoy and explore it far more favorably, and fully, when first you attract, along your linear timeline, certain other ideas, knowledge, and resources."

Trust That You Get What You Want

The first thing to do to get what you want is to trust your timing. You choose to trust that you do get what you want. Trusting the timing goes something like this, "I am very excited about this particular thing. Is it available? Yes or no? Yes, I do it. No, well, I'm still excited about it, but it's not available."

If you continue to obsess on that point when it is not available, it actually distracts you from something else. What is that something else? That something else is the unique advantage available in the moment.

If you are using "this moment" to wish you were at "that moment," you are doing so at the cost of what is right in front of you. Remind yourself: "I, now, choose to express that I get what I want, and this is not available, and I still want it," and push it aside. Push it out of your view yet maintain it as a clear intention: “I intend to do this whenever it comes up, no matter what.” Once you push it aside, with the assurance of that intention, you then remove the obstruction of what is right in front of you, the unique advantage of the moment you are within.

Needless to say, this is an approach and not the only approach. It is a viewpoint. It is not superior to any other viewpoint you have taken, but it is as easy as any other viewpoint you have taken. It is a matter of not settling for anything less than what you deserve, and you deserve what you desire.

Focus on the Most Exciting Option

When your clear intention is not available, there is a very interesting method that you can use to get that thing more quickly. As we have said before, that is by pushing it aside and using your excitement and passion. See what choices you have right now, and from those choices, act on the one that excites you the most with integrity.

That option may seem to have absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with that desire, that want, or that clear intention. However, the fact that you desire it more than anything else that’s available, the fact that it excites you more than anything else that’s available, and the fact that that clear intention excites you mean they have excitement in common. Excitement is your particular unique expression of who you are from what’s available. The fact that something excites you in a given moment, though it may situationally seem to have nothing to do with that clear intention that is not available in that moment, tells you in no uncertain terms that it is related.

By pushing away everything that's not available, you ground yourself to the moment. When you explore what is available, you use the unique advantages that each moment has to offer. The only thing that you are doing is choosing to view your reality from this perspective and doing that thing. If you act on what excites you with integrity, then you cannot, in the process, harm anyone else or yourself.

More About Integrity

In regard to "integrity," I remind you that I do not mean this from your general moral term "integrity," which is quite subjective and quite variable from group to group on your planet. I mean "integrity," as it stems from the word "integrated whole." Remember, you are an infinite being seeming, or choosing to seem, to exist within a reality. But, again, as I have said and will now expand on, the reality exists within you.

The paradox is that reality exists within each and every one of you, and, although it would seem like this could not be possible, you are getting the idea of an infinite concept, where each one of you will experience that all of reality exists within them, including all the others in the room and the entire planet. This seeming inconsistency is an infinite concept.

Anything within the reality is part of one integrated whole. Everything that you interact with is a reflection within the integrated whole of your consciousness. Each thing tells you something about yourself and about what you are choosing to explore from your finite point of view.

Act with Integrity

If you acknowledge the integration of all reality, I assume that your actions will reflect the respect that anything you interact with is not separate from you but is part of you. Integrity is simply acting according to that respect for everything within you, for your agreements, and for the interactions that you choose to co-create with other individuals.

One other way to look at integrity is, “Well, can I act on this particular option with integrity?” Integrity is when you superimpose any individuals that you are dealing with on yourself. Perhaps, going something like, “Well, if that were me, would I like it if someone did that or interacted with me in that way?” This can be summed up by one of the phraseologies on your planet, “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.”

Following that guideline always expresses your integrity. It always treats everything within you, everyone within you, and every situation within you as though it is you. When you express that, you treat yourself and every aspect of yourself with that same respect.

So, if you are able to act on an exciting prospect with integrity, no harm done, for you are treating your reality with the respect it deserves, and you are honoring the expression of your excitement, which is the expression, once again, of who you are.

Excitement Is Your Guidance

Why does something excite you? You in particular. Everyone is excited about something slightly different. Some people may overlap and share exciting notions, but each excitement expression is unique. That is because excitement is the personalized indicator that reality gives you to tell you from what's available which options are most you. That is what excitement is. Excitement is the vibration, the compass, and the barometer that tells you, "This is me."

If "this is me," and you can act on it with integrity, do so. If a particular option seems the most exciting, but you cannot do it with integrity, push it aside. Do not fixate or obsess over it. The criteria are excitement with integrity.

If you cannot act on it with integrity, it is not an option for you. When you push it aside rather than keep it there, you allow yourself to see what is just right behind it. Each moment has a unique option and a unique advantage.

Doing this and maintaining your desire, your clear intention, and the thing that you want is all that it takes to continue to be who you are, to interact with your reality with integrity, and to finally experience the thing you say you want.

Delays Are in Your Favor

When the thing that you want is an option, and you have gone through many other experiences, you are now more equipped to explore that exciting thing. After you establish an exciting thing is a clear intention, the timing and the lack of it being available right now allows you to accumulate through experience, resources, and knowledge, tools that will enable you, no matter what you say right now, to enjoy that thing more fully than you can even imagine.

Choose to Trust You Get What You Want

All this is a matter of taking the trust that many of you place in the fact that things never work out and shifting it to the more empowering point of view that you do get what you want. Perhaps, at first, it doesn't happen or come when you think it should, but if you still want it and get it, what's the difference? And, if you begin to not want it and don't get it, what's the difference?

The point is, generally, you will find that you will maintain that desire, that excitement, and you will, through a series of amazing coincidences and things coming from all different directions that you never expected, attract resources, individuals, timing, knowledge, and equipment that will place you in a moment where that thing you want is one of the options that you can act on with integrity.

In a Nutshell: Trust Your Timing

In a nutshell, this is what it means to trust your timing. Each time that you do not take this approach, you are trusting that there is no timing and that you do not get what you want. And, you get the evidence and effect that there is no intelligence to the timing and that you do not get what you want, except once in a while when you get lucky.

Seeing and concentrating on what's right in front of your face, choosing the most exciting thing, and then acting on it with integrity is "no big deal," as you say. It is easy. It is fun. It is effortless. Acting on the things that excite you with integrity takes no effort and produces no struggle.

If it is available, now's the time, as you say, "to go for it." If it is not, you still get what you want. Allow that to roll around in your mentality. Allow this approach to be sampled by you.

Assume Things Are Going Well

Obviously, the way you create your reality right now is flawless; your reality is ongoing, and you experience it. However, perhaps the idea of consciously creating your life, of creating according to preference, may just appeal to you. I don't know; maybe it will.

In our society, we have found from our own experience that we will settle for nothing less, and the mechanism is flawless. When you follow your excitement with integrity in each moment right here, right now, you create new effects.

As you act on something that excites you, there is a result that puts a new thing into the options that wouldn't have been there before. Something that excites you in this moment, though it may seem to have nothing to do with the most exciting thing, is, by definition, a stepping stone that literally creates the next stone, and so on and so forth.

Everything is related and part of one integrated whole. This is you, this is your reality, and this is one option of how you can live your life. When you do so, life is effortless. You experience what you call “ecstasy.” Everything is an effortless conscious creation. When you do so, not only do you change, and not only does your life change, but miraculously, so does everyone around you.

Expressing Yourself Is Contagious

Your new approach, by the way, becomes quite contagious. When people see someone else living in this way, validating themselves using and choosing from their excitement, they get attracted to this idea because they see that it works at least as well as the disempowering notions they already use. It all works. It is simply a matter of choosing which one you want. You get what you want.

The Ultimate Truth

One thing that we sometimes share with you is the ultimate truth.

“Ah, the ultimate truth! What is the ultimate truth, Elan? Please tell me.”

Alright, I will.

The ultimate truth, to ultimately be the truth, leaves nothing out. The ultimate truth must—now listen up, if you choose to sleep, wake up now—the ultimate truth must be composed of all truths. Leave one out, and it is almost the ultimate truth. All truths must exist within the ultimate truth.

What this means is that all truths, all beliefs, and all approaches are valid.

A Truth Is a Way, Not the Way

Obviously, being a person that can only choose one thing at a time means you cannot choose all truths. In fact, some truths may actually seem to contradict one another, but that does not make one right and one wrong. That makes both the truth for each of the people expressing and exploring them.

When you get a feel for the fact that all truths are true for the people choosing them, you take the burden off your shoulders of having to convert everyone over to your truth. Believe me, your neck and shoulders will feel better when you remove that weight from yourself. The bottom line is that it is a futile effort to assume that “your truth is the only truth, and that’s it.” When you do that, you miss out on all the other options.

Another way to look at this is that “My truth is a truth, is the truth that I am choosing to explore. I have my reasons. Certainly, I have my right to explore any truth I wish.” Why not consider affording that attitude to everyone? “Well, their truth may be at odds with my truth, but they have their reasons. I wish to express that I have the right to express my truth. Obviously, even though their truth may look misguided to me, they have the right to explore their truth.”

Simply removing the idea that a truth is the only way and replacing it with the idea that it is a way can lubricate the friction that people create between one another. You can validate everyone else's truth without condoning it.

Condoning a Truth Is Expressing It

Condoning someone's truth, by the way, is not validating it; it is not saying, "Well, you have the right and reason to believe that." Condoning someone else's truth is you acting according to their truth. "Well, I'll show them how that feels!" You are being them when you show them that. You are expressing their truth and proving to them that their truth absolutely works, as well.

All Truths Are Valid

All truths are valid. All truths work. All belief systems are complete packages, and they carry with them their own set of evidence, their own set of results, even if they seem completely opposite. When you expand your version of the ultimate truth to include all other truths, you can even come face-to-face with an individual saying their way is the only way and allow their way to be valid, even though you choose to act according to your way.

In other words, their truth may not encompass yours, but yours can always continue to encompass theirs. Having and expressing this understanding on an individual level is all it takes to expand out, level by level, person by person, on your planet. The bulk of struggle and conflict that occurs on your planet is when an ideology or philosophy builds into its doctrine, "This is the only way, and anything else stinks, get out of here.” Instead, understand that that is only one perspective.

Validating Truths Gives You Strength

Obviously, when people have the perspective that their truth is the only way, they do not allow themselves to have as many options to choose from. When sharing your truth, if you simply look at it from the perspective that, “This is a truth, a very valid truth. It works. If you are attracted to it, come here, and I will share it with you. If not, go along your way. You will find your own truth.”

If everyone on your planet were to, tomorrow, embrace this idea, what you call “war” would cease. As a society, what you would begin to understand, as we have understood, is that there is actually strength and unity in diversity. The truths that insist that all other truths have no right to be there will, generally, create a reality in which they will, in some way, eradicate themselves from it. That’s because it is inconsistent with your expression. Negative people, who will choose to explore negativity, will always get the results of their negativity, but that is none of your “business,” so to speak.

Allowing All Truths Makes Things Easier

In terms of expressing your truth, it is your business and concern. When you embrace all possibilities, you allow yourself to live as an expanded being rather than a contracted one.

If you were to consider for at least a moment some particular truth that seems quite bigoted and disempowering and why one might feel that way, you will see in almost every instance perhaps just a glimmer of why someone would be that way. That gives you the compassion to understand that, though you may not choose to be that way, they have the right and reason.

By having an attitude of, “Well, I’ll show them,” you reinforce their reality. By maintaining who you are and allowing them to be who they are without condoning their actions, you show them another possibility. When you give someone back what they’re giving, you reinforce their reality. When you show an alternative, you give them another choice.

It is not your “business” to decide whether or not they will take that choice, but you will often find people do not really wish to remain disempowered, nor do they really wish to think that reality is crumbling all around them, nor do they really wish to think they are unloved, nor judged from within and from without.

Expressing Yourself Serves Others

The only way you can even come close to being able to provide to a disempowered person any sense of service is by expressing your own empowerment. That shows them that at least it’s possible. It makes the statement, “Here’s a living example.” That is not your job, but that will be an automatic result.

Compassion doesn't need to be sympathy. Compassion can be your honoring of their power and ability to create. When creating a circumstance, it can be honoring their ability to handle the results. If you can assist, by all means, do, but if you cannot, at least acknowledge and respect their sovereignty and creator-hood.

Perhaps they are creating from a disempowered perspective, but nonetheless, they are just as flawlessly creating. You are perfect creators. Perfect. When you choose misery and strife, you create perfect misery and strife. But that is no less a perfect creation. To you, it may be a less preferred creation, and that's why you can change your perspective.

You cannot be responsible for anyone else, only to them. Only they can make the choices and take action in their life. However, you can be responsible for yourself in expressing who you are. This brings me back, once again, to using your excitement and trusting in your timing.

Reminder: You Get What You Want

If something is not available, you always have the choice to say, "Well, since it's not available, I don't get it. I never get what I want," and so on and so forth. Or, you have the ability to say, "I thought that I was really ready for this, but apparently, I am only ready to just look at it. Awesome. I am now very excited because that means I will enjoy this even more than I can imagine. I'll wait."

If you simply assume that you get what you want, and that is a given, then let go. If you know you're going to get what you want, what else is there left to do but enjoy yourself from now until then? You definitely get it. In any case, that's one way to approach it if you want to.

Your timing is perfect and flawless. You have an expression, "An idea that has come before its time." No, just talking about the idea tells you it is time, and conversely, the fact that it's not available tells you it's not. You get what you want if you allow yourself to assume and insist that it is so.

Because you create in an unfolding manner, you do not allow yourself to see how everything will play out. You do this on purpose, I might add. If you could see, you'd lose the discovery, you'd lose the surprise, and you'd lose the "Everyone knows the first time is the best time" experience.

By the way, the first time is not necessarily always the best time, but I understand what you mean. The first time is uniquely one experience, and then any other time you do it is actually, again, the first time with a little bit of knowledge. So, you can also look at it that way.

Conclusion

Remember that you attracted yourself to this material. That is nothing but an expression of your timing. It isn't an accident that you are here right now at this time.

By the way, most of the time, you will see why the timing was so, yet once in a while, you will not. Big deal. That is part of the discovery and the surprise. You know what you need to know when you need to know it if you simply acknowledge that.

Use Negativity to Find Alignment

Dealing with the negative aspects of reality is something that many people wish to understand how to deal with better. Many people try to avoid feeling bad. Your society tends to label feeling bad as a problem. However, negativity is one of your greatest opportunities for positive growth.

First, let us give you some background on who you are and your relationship to the universe and to us. This will help you understand more clearly how negativity fits into your experience. Without this understanding, you may feel that negative things are happening to you. So, bear with us as we cover some foundational materials.

When you really grasp this background, you will then be able to use your negativity as a very powerful tool of alignment. You will come to see negativity not as something to be avoided but as your friend and an opportunity to very rapidly move your life forward.

Overall, one of the things we really want to share is that reality exists within you. Reality is you. What you see as negative are truly aspects of yourself that you are defining as negative. But like I said, let's build some background first.

You Are Extraterrestrials

Although we identify ourselves as extraterrestrials, by the way, to us, you are extraterrestrial. As we have said before, we do not in any way insist that anything that we have to say or any way that we are creating our lives is any better than your own.

In fact, we recognize that all methods of expression, all ways of being, are not only completely valid but completely equal. Perhaps you will understand this, too, as your own awareness of other forms of life expands. Though there are certain things that have worked for us in our society that perhaps will be of use to you, this does not assume that what we are saying is any better than what you are already doing.

You Are Experts at Focus

As I have said, you are all perfect creators, flawless. You are already creating a complete reality. So completely do you create your reality that you actually can experience the apparency of being a separate being cut off from the rest of all reality, not connected to all the rest of the reality that you contain.

To us, this is a very, very focused exploration. Your society creates and expresses its consciousness in this way because it has a very focused expertise. You're all specialists in limitation and in separation. I do not say this to poke fun at you. I say this with the utmost respect for the courage it entails to experience yourself in such a way.

For the last 25,000 years of your social history, you have very literally created yourself to have a very focused point of view. You are so focused, we remind you, that you seem to be separate from the rest of creation.

You Are Expanding Your Views

One of the reasons we are able to communicate with you at this time is that you are arising from this cycle of limitation. You are expanding from your fine degree of focus and beginning to entertain the notion that perhaps, just perhaps, you actually have more to do with the statement of yourself as a being and with your very reality than you have heretofore chosen to express.

What I am saying is that you are expanding both personally and collectively. As you do so and your awareness expands, your awareness of many other things and many other ways of being, by extension, also expands. You attract on, perhaps, what you perceive to be "the edges of your reality," what you sometimes refer to as "weird phenomena," things that couldn't have possibly existed before this particular time.

Your Awareness Increases

Many, many things obviously exist that you are not aware of personally. As you expand and grow, you become more aware and marvel and revel at the things that exist. Remember, reality is you and a creation of your consciousness. As you begin to explore the more remote parts of yourself, some of the ideas within that awareness are the more “alien” portions of yourself.

In a certain way, this is what your ability to now perceive me, although only in this format at this point, represents. It represents your beginning to explore those corners as you create them in your consciousness. It means beginning to expand your point of view to encompass more. You are beginning to collectively entertain the notion that there is life, intelligent life, other than on your planet.

From my perspective, this is a given, but each and every one of you will make your own decision. I do not insist by the way that you believe who I say I am. That is not important for this book. I am more concerned with sharing information with you and learning from you as well. You can decide if the information is useful to you and if it is, by all means, use it. If not, you will still have learned more about who you are by seeing a sparkling example of who you are not. Either way, you learn. Either way, you grow. Either way, and this applies, by the way, to anything that you attract in your reality, you expand and define yourself still further.

Reality Exists within You

Ironically, as you define yourself further and further, you realize “how big,” so to speak, you really are. Although you create the apparency that you exist within a reality, you are so large, and I mean this arbitrarily, that in actuality, you are coming to find that the reality exists within you. At least from a physical point of view, this is very large. As you attract awareness and expand your consciousness, you begin to recall, to remember, and to attract the tools that allow you to accelerate that awareness.

Many of the things we discuss with you may seem to fall under the category you sometimes refer to as “metaphysical.” This is because we speak of yourselves as creators beyond the physical: metaphysical. However, we also include the ability to create your physical reality as well.

We Are All Teachers and Students

One of the most notable reasons that we interact with you is your readiness and your willingness to begin to understand yourself as creators that much more. Because we create our own reality 100% consciously, we are some, just some of the sharers that you attract.

Sometimes you will say, “When you are ready, the teacher will come.” That is one of your sayings, but I will refrain from using the word teacher for we are all equal sharers. Each of us teaches what it is that we have to share, but we also always learn, and remembering that allows you to remain open, allows you to balance the energy of output with the energy of receptivity.

You Exist within My Consciousness

So, therefore, I learn from you as well, and I thank you for your willingness to allow me to experience your consciousness. The more I understand about you, the more I understand about me. To me, you all exist within my consciousness. The paradox is that this is true for each and every person. Perhaps at first, that seems confusing, but that will change as you expand your awareness. Each person contains the entire reality.

“Uh...that sounds like a bunch of nonsense, Elan.”

Alright. That is the nature of paradox, things that would seem to be mutually exclusive, “it must be this, it must be that,” when you actually find out that it is both not “this or that,” but both.

You are people, each with your own personal point of view, and yet, you each contain the entirety of reality, and this will make more sense as you expand your awareness. Right now, make a note of it.

Creating Your Reality Consciously

One of the things that we discuss with you is creating your reality consciously. As we have mentioned, as you have heard, and as many of you entertain, you do create your reality. However, you have a definition that when you do so not according to preference, not according to intention, you do so “unconsciously.” The moment you allow yourself to be aware of something, however, it is now a conscious awareness.

If you entertain the notion that you create your reality, even if you entertain that some of it is created by you unconsciously, you can allow the unconscious “portion” of your creation to become conscious so that your reality is a reflection and an extension of both your intention and your preference rather than a random event, subject to the “whim” of your temperamental subconscious mind. That is one way to look at it.

Conscious Unknowingness

As you allow awareness, the unconscious becomes conscious. You call it “unconscious knowingness,” we call it “conscious unknowingness.” It’s basically the same term with a slightly different spin. “Conscious unknowingness” puts it back into your power to change. “Unconscious knowingness” has you searching behind “every nook and cranny,” as you say, within your partitioned reality as you create.

You Are One Whole

You are a 100% being. One of the ways that you often express and define yourself is as a collection of parts, not only body parts but different parts of your consciousness. Our understanding is that there is one consciousness. You are one whole 100% being; therefore, you can express this by allowing things to be conscious.

Step 1: You Decide Who You Are

The way, and this is, by the way, a slight review from our previous chapters, you now create your reality is very simple. In any given moment, regardless of what is present in that moment and your excuse or reasons for doing so, you decide who you are. You make a decision, “I am this person.”

Either you do so consciously because it is who you desire to be, or you do so because “This is telling me this. This is here. This is here, so I must be this type of person.” Either way, you decide. You make a decision.

When you do this consciously, that means you create your reality by deciding with intention because you say so and with self-commandment, which is one of your abilities to express.

Often you will identify circumstances in a given moment and say, “Well, I must be this person because look at the mess I’ve created.” That is still a decision, “I am this person.” Your reality and the perpetuation of the creation of your reality begins with deciding who you are.

Step 2: You Trust That Decision

Once you decide who you are, the next thing you do, perhaps somewhat automatically at this point, is trust in that decision: “Well, I am this person. Therefore, this person acts this particular way. This person responds this particular way.” You trust. You play along with the decision very literally.

Step 3: You Act

Thirdly, you act as though you trust in the decision of who you have defined yourself to be. When you take action in your physical life, you create phenomena, circumstances, and interactions. You create what you refer to as a “reaction.”

Creating Consciously

As we have discussed, consciously deciding who you prefer to be is the first step to consciously creating your reality. Perhaps at first, this will involve some “insightful thinking” and some “touching base” with the things that move you, that excite you, and that bring you joy with integrity. When you allow yourself to identify who you prefer to be, you can then state and make that decision with focus and with conscious intention. “I am this person because this is who I choose to be, and this is what makes me feel like I am the person I wish to be.”

In order for your conscious decision to become your life, you must trust that now that you have made that decision, that’s who you are, no matter what the reality may appear like. When you maintain that decision, you also maintain an awareness of your intention. In any given moment, you can then determine the actions which will be consistent with that decision.

Opportunities

Let us tie this all together, so we can address negativity in particular. When you make the decision to be the person that you choose to be, if you have some way of thinking that runs contrary to that decision, it will come up. When it comes up, it allows you to see it. At that point, you have a choice. You can say, “Well, now that I see this, I will use this as an opportunity to align and remind myself of who I prefer to be, or I can allow whatever the circumstance is to talk me out of it and to be evidence that, of course, I’m not that person, or this would not exist.”

Some of the things that initially come up may seem on the surface to run contrary or thwart the decision that you have made. These things are actually opportunities for alignment. They are your opportunity to realign and reaffirm who you are in that moment.

Remind Yourself of Your Decision

Many of the things that you have allowed to talk yourself out of being the person you desire to be are actually the very tools and opportunities that will allow you to reestablish that person and show yourself that you really are that person. If you are that person, and if you make that decision, trusting that decision means not allowing anything to talk you out of it.

If you trust the decision, then nothing can talk you out of it. “I am this person, so regardless of this circumstance in my life that seems to run contrary to the thing that I desire, I’m still this person, and I will interact with that circumstance as this person rather than allowing it to talk me out of who I have chosen to be.”

Either way, you will make a decision, you will trust that decision, and act on the circumstance. But if you allow the circumstances to talk you out of who you are, the actions will be far different than if you allow the circumstance to be an opportunity of aligning yourself to who you prefer to be.

Obstacles Can Be Road Signs

Many of the things that you label in your life, reality, and experience as obstacles and blocks in your path are actually not only road signs and detours but opportunities to establish and apply the trust in who you have decided consciously to be. The obstacles are actually there on purpose in order to show you the ideal path. If you ignore them or deny them, you deny the very tools that will help you get where you want to be much more quickly. You can ignore the detour signs and take the road that is closed, but you will find it is a slow and tiresome process. Instead, pay attention to the detours and learn how to use them. They are not mistakes. There is nothing wrong with you. You are not throwing your metaphysical training down the drain by seeing an obstacle. You are showing yourself an easier path if you will pay attention.

An Example: Paying a Bill

Many of you have had an experience where you decide, “I am abundant,” and then all of a sudden, along comes a symbol that seems to run contrary to the fact that you are abundant. For example, it may be a bill that you cannot pay at that moment.

You could say, feeling defeated, “Ah! I thought I was abundant, but if I was abundant, I would be able to pay this bill, so I must not be abundant. Oh, poor me.”

In that case, you have let the external circumstance persuade you into making a new decision, “I am not abundant after all,” which means you never really trusted that you were abundant. You never fully trusted the decision. At the first challenge to that decision, you go tucking your tail between your legs and run. You have allowed a circumstance to show you where your trust truly lies.

If instead, you use that circumstance to shift your perspective and to consciously apply your trust, that very bill that you cannot pay is an opportunity to stand up tall and say confidently, “I am abundant. I know I’m abundant. I made the decision. I create my reality. Therefore, this cannot be evidence that I am not abundant. It is evidence of something, and I will allow it to become apparent as it needs to, but I am abundant. It is my intention to be able to pay bills as they come in. I will look at the symbol. It is there. Perhaps, there is a deadline attached to it, but I know I am abundant, and therefore I intend to pay the bill. I know I can’t now. It is not one of the options, but I will move forward with the options that are available as being the abundant person rather than the tail-between-legs person.” There is another path that will help you pay that bill, but not if you insist that you have failed because then you will not be looking for that other path, even if it’s right in front of you.

You're Always Using Your Power

Perhaps at first, this sounds like a mental exercise or a form of placating yourself, fooling yourself, or patronizing yourself. Those are just some of the excuses that individuals will create to not trust in the decision. However, it is far more than that.

When you choose to decide, "I am not abundant because I have this bill I cannot pay," you are still making a decision. You are deciding, "I am no longer abundant. I implicitly trust that I'm not abundant. Here's the certificate." And you will act, believe me, according to that trust. You will perform actions with the foundation of the decision you do not prefer, and those actions will create circumstances that will continue to reinforce the person you say you do not choose to be.

Relabel Your Liabilities as Assets

It is far more than fooling yourself. It is realigning yourself to your intention and, one by one, using what you have heretofore labeled your greatest liabilities as your greatest assets.

If you proceed as an individual who must not really be abundant, your actions will continue to create circumstances that will continue to reinforce that you are not abundant. If instead, you use it as an opportunity to align to who you are, then you will do something different, you will move differently, you will hold yourself differently, you will interact with individuals differently, you will maintain that abundance consciousness, and the results of those actions obviously would be different. That will create circumstances in which you can pay the bill because you have looked at the issue and the belief that underlies the symbol.

The Bill Is a Symbol

The bill is nothing external that has control over you; the bill is a symbol of an internal concept. Everything in physical reality is. This is what you begin to realize. Everything is a symbol, even the IRS! It is a symbol. It is a symbol of your integrity, of your agreements, and of your ability to create to the level that you desire.

Opportunities Are All Around

Opportunities for alignment are all around you. If you decide, “This is who I am,” you completely trust it, and you completely act that way and have no “issues” that run contrary to that decision, reality will reflect that. Things will not come up that seem to run contrary to your decision. If things continue to come up, those things are allowing you to get to the core of these issues, to reestablish your preference, and to reestablish who you choose to be.

When you act that way, those actions have results. Those results reinforce your decision. Down the line, those opportunities become fewer and fewer because you handle the issues that underlie them. All circumstance, all reality, literally, is an external reflection of an internal substance of consciousness. You create it in terms of thoughts, emotions, and beliefs. It is truly consciousness.

Embrace the Opportunities

Therefore, look around. When you decide who you are, embrace the opportunities. You can actually have some fun with this. You can actually enjoy reaffirming yourself. You will actually begin to see, “Well, this month, I can pay this bill. Well, this month, I am able to get this thing that I want.” But this doesn’t happen when you sell out to circumstance. It doesn’t happen when you allow the issues that you have to talk you out of who you want to be. Instead, it happens when you allow them to reinforce your clear intention. “I am this person; therefore, I approach this situation as the person I want to be, and I act that way.”

You create by deciding, trusting in that decision, and acting as though you trust in that decision. This is how you’ve always created. This is how you can create consciously.

Your Society Enjoys Limitation

I am not saying you have to create consciously. Perhaps you enjoy limitation. Perhaps you enjoy separation. Perhaps you enjoy getting your feet into the mud of limitation. Perhaps you enjoy creating limitation to enjoy what is unique about it.

We interact with many different extraterrestrial societies. There is a broad spectrum of how fine their focus is. I will say that the majority of these societies choose to be far less focused than your own. They more easily understand their overall connection to everything and that they are sparks of the infinite creation, not separate from it.

Your society is very finely focused and experiences a high degree of limitation and separation. It is unusual in the universe. Some of these other societies have “evolved” their thinking so that they now understand their connection. Others never chose to create that degree of limitation to begin with. In many ways, your society is unique to us, and it is an opportunity to learn.

The paradox is we are not able to interact with you in too much of the infancy of this focus because when you are so finely focused, you cannot perceive us. You will not accept the idea of any other consciousness, of any other life, nor of any other being. To even be reading this, you have evolved your thinking process. You have expanded your awareness to the point where you entertain the notions we discuss.

The way in which you experience limitation fascinates us. We respect you. We honor your choice. We honor your sovereignty.

We Will Remain Unobtrusive for Now

Contrary to what you may hear, you will not see us land on mass prior to your mass invitation. That would be interfering with your choice. That would be saying, “Well, you can’t handle what you create.” It would be dishonoring you as a being. So, therefore, we remain unobtrusive.

We remain in the background as you expand your awareness. You may see and hear more of the possibility of our existence, and certain individuals will get “physical proof.”

Hello

However, how you will admit our existence remains largely speculative, and we honor your sovereignty as being.

You will have many individuals in your society representing our viewpoints in many ways. Remember, I am only speaking for my own civilization. People may say that your planet is sinking and drowning and that extraterrestrials will come down, save you, beam you up, take you up, and take you home, but to us, this is a disservice to you as creators. This is an inaccurate representation of our approach to other societies, and it is a disservice.

You may believe whatever you wish. You may attract whatever you wish. When you talk about us taking you home, you are not acknowledging that this is home. You create your reality and choose to do so on some level of your awareness, and so, for now, at least, this is home.

You Are Home

Home is wherever you are. Home is what you are. If you allow yourself to be aware of this, you can feel this and understand that you carry home around with you. If you insist that home is somewhere else, you are always trying to leave here and go somewhere, and you often feel you are never quite getting there. That's because you are bringing home around with you anyway and not realizing it.

We Honor You as Creators

Knowing what we know and having the abilities that we have, it may seem to some of you that it is “cruel” to allow the suffering that you created on your planet. I understand that it can seem ridiculous that anyone who is involved in such suffering created it on some level. Though it may appear “cruel” to say that, it is actually honoring that decision.

This does not mean we condone violence, famine, injustice, or cruelty. No, we do not condone it at all. Therefore, in our reality, in our society, we do not create it. But we understand that on some level of your awareness, you are choosing to experience that degree of separation and now are choosing to expand your awareness.

Be a Role Model

You can certainly be who you are and make a positive difference on your planet. At the same time, you cannot take responsibility for anyone else. You cannot make choices or act for them. You can only be responsible to them in whatever way you are able to assist them, but you cannot do anything for them. The mere fact that you cannot allows you to see in no uncertain terms that they create their experience, and you create your experience.

Sitting in your comfortable chair, it may be completely unthinkable that anyone would create lack, limitation, famine, and separation. You have a limited view of the situation and do not understand the overall focus. Your planet as a whole is moving away from this, but in doing so, a lot of the remnants or vestiges of these ideas are being stirred up.

Your ability to “globally communicate” is allowing one group or one person to have an experience and many, many, many, many, many groups and many, many, many people to participate from afar in that experience and to be aware of that experience. When individuals on your planet create and explore what would seem to be negative, not only do they get to experience those results but so do you all from the comfort of your computers and phones.

Global Communication Represents Expansion

Your expanding awareness also manifests in the very idea of “global communication,” which is expanding at an exponential rate on your planet right now. You can look for the signs that you are not evolving as a race or the excuses that keep yourself down, or instead, you can look at the absolute evidence that you are expanding and that you are increasing your ability to reach out and be living examples, which is the strongest form of assistance.

Empowerment Not Dependence

Doing something for someone that they are not able to do for themselves is a form of dependence. Being the person that you assume you should be, and being a living example of what can be, is by far a stronger symbol to everyone involved. As I have said, you can all see each other more now.

If you choose to see it, this is a very exciting time for you all. If you choose to decide who you are, not only will it make an absolute difference in your life, but you will add many more positive reflections and positive options to the life of others.

In interacting with you, very literally, this is what we do. We simply explain our perspective and pose another option so that if it looks attractive, you have one more option. If it does not, you will attract another source. You always have, and you always will.

Everything Is Actually You

The irony is that these sources are all reflections from inside of you. When you decide who you are, and a circumstance comes along that seems to “test you,” as many of you say, “Well, God, or ‘all that is,’ or the universe, is testing me.” Not really.

You are testing. There is no outside universe. There is no outside “all that is” or “infinite creator.” You are an expression of the universe of “all that is,” of what you call “God” directly, whether or not you choose to express that. It is an option, and that option is part of the unconditional love of the creative force.

Conclusion

You have increased your awareness to the point where we can have conversations. Though it is not in any way necessary, very literally, these types of infusions of you acting like conscious creators, from whatever the source, bring us closer together and closer to interacting physically.

It is our perception that we will interact physically with your society, maybe even within a few years of your time. All that it will require is personal intention, personal transformation, and personal request. It is not the point that we interact. It is perhaps what you would call “a fringe benefit” or “a side effect” of expanding your awareness. But never will we present ourselves to you as “proof” that we exist. We already know we exist, and we don’t need proof.

Hello

Act Like an Owner

You create your reality and your life; therefore, you are an owner. You own your life and reality. The sooner you get a grasp of this and act like an owner, the sooner you will get the results you say you want.

In that light, allow us to introduce something. It may seem like it's not new but understand again that that in and of itself is a perspective. If you approach all situations as if they were the first time, you can then experience them as fresh and anew.

Though you may have heard what we are going to present, we suggest you tune your ears slightly differently so that you can discover it for the first time. What we simply present to you is a phrase: "the wild card."

When you play cards, often there is a particular designated card or cards that, if they come up, allow you to progress, or jump, or achieve your ends a bit more quickly, and that is the wild card. The wild card is a very variable symbol. In this case, carrying around a wild card in your pocket may enable you to act as an owner of your reality in the instances where perhaps you are not doing so all the time.

Allow us to first reiterate the phrase again. Read with fresh eyes but understand that no matter what situation you are in in your life, this perspective will always align you with your purpose. Even asking the question will have you acting like an owner.

Act Like an Owner

If you are an owner of your reality and act that way, then nothing is extraneous. If something exists within reality and you are the owner of the reality, obviously, you must have created it. If you act like an owner, then you can use all your creations. If you deny even one, at least for that moment, you are not acting like an owner. You still own it, but you are not acting that way.

The Wild Card Phrase

The wild card is actually a phrase. The phrase is, “How does this serve me exactly the way it is.” When you are in the middle of a negative situation, you can pull out the wild card and use it. Ask yourself that question, and you will receive the message and gift the situation is providing to you.

We want to show you how to apply this to three common negative emotions: fear, anger, and frustration.

Fear

Fear is when you believe a reality you do not prefer is most likely. It is the same belief as saying to the universe that you believe that something you do not prefer is probably going to happen. Obviously, by extension, this is not the statement or the perspective of an owner.

If you truly own the reality, there is nothing that can slip in there and get you. If you feel fear in this regard, then you can use it, but not by pushing it away, not by denying it, but by asking yourself, “How does it serve me exactly as it is? What does it allow me to see about who I am? What does it allow me to understand about the degree to which I believe that I create my own reality?”

What enables you to use it most fully is to allow yourself to feel it. You own the reality. You created the fear. If you believe you created it for a reason, dive into it. Use it. If you deny it, then you do not believe you own it. Then you believe it is extraneous, and you are not acting like an owner.

So, first and foremost, when you believe that something that you do not prefer is most likely, use that opportunity to view your beliefs. You may find you have limiting beliefs. If you are honest with yourself and allow yourself to truly feel the fear, and then ask it what it is trying to tell you, it will provide the answer.

When you feel it rather than squash it, you allow the emotion to play out. When you finally decide, “Alright! Alright! Alright! I am fearful. I will not deny this. I will feel this fear. I will really feel it.” When you allow yourself to permeate your being with this feeling, you generally get to the point where you say, “Okay, now what?”

When you do this, you have used the emotion. When you are at the precipice of “now what,” you can pull out that wildcard, polish it off, dust it off, and ask yourself the question, “How does this serve me exactly the way it is,” and allow yourself to be honest about where your limiting beliefs lie. As you weed them out one by one, only then can you change them.

Anger

Our second example is “anger.” We define “anger” as a complete and entire rush of alignment. When you experience a particular perspective or reality, anger tells you how you stand, “This is me. This is absolutely not.” That is of service. That is self-definition and self-exploration. By knowing what is not you, you have a firmer grasp of what is.

Accept What Anger Is Telling You

The true anger, that alignment, only lasts 10 to 15 seconds. However, some of you, if not all, can relate to the fact that when you create “anger,” generally, it seems to last quite a bit longer. This is because from the 10 to 15-second point onward, it is no longer that rush of alignment. That rush of alignment only takes 10 to 15 seconds. After that, after you have defined yourself, you then go a step further by invalidating the thing you don’t prefer.

Rather than simply saying, “This is me. This is not. The thing that is me is okay. The thing that is not me is okay as well; it’s just not for me,” individuals will generally say, “This is me, this is okay. This is not me; get out of here, you stink!” This perspective denies the validity of your exploration and denies the usefulness of how you have just defined yourself.

Apply the Wild Card

When you have aligned, you can ask yourself, “How does this serve me exactly as it is?” Perhaps in this instance, it serves you by allowing you the opportunity to accept that “it’s alright to experience that rush of alignment and get angry; however, I don’t need to take that to the next level by turning it into judgment and invalidation.”

Prolonged Anger Is Invalidating Yourself

When you judge or invalidate, you love conditionally. If you insist that a person must meet certain conditions before they are lovable, you are also applying that to yourself. If you judge and invalidate things you do not prefer, you are most definitely also judging and invalidating the things within yourself that you do not prefer. When you sense you are rendering judgment to someone else, you are also judging and invalidating yourself. You cannot express unconditional love and self-judgment at the same time.

Validate What You Don't Prefer

By definition, the moment you judge and say some things are better than others, you have given one thing more relative significance than another, and then you cut yourself off from choosing that as an option. It is always to your advantage to see all things as equal. When you use them positively, you can then transform the effect of your anger into a positive result.

Yes, I did say that you can actually get angry and only have a positive experience if you allow the 10 to 15 seconds of the alignment of anger to serve you and then do not go to the extent of invalidating what is not representative of who you are. Therefore, the wildcard functions in full swing in this example.

Frustration and Boredom

Let us discuss frustration and boredom. "Frustration" can simply be defined as an emotion that arises when you are unwilling to be in a given moment. If you are focused on the given moment, then you are very wide-eyed and looking around at what is available in that moment. When, however, you project that there is something better out there that is not available and leave it at that, you create a corresponding emotion you call "frustration."

How It Serves You

You can allow that to serve you by using it as a sign that you are not in that moment, grounding yourself to that moment. We are not saying you cannot have goals and you cannot have things that are exciting to you that you may not be able to act on, and therefore, they are kept from you. No.

As we have shared many times, the things you are excited about that you cannot act on will eventually be options to act on, but what allows that to happen most quickly is the acknowledgment of what you can act on in a given moment. When you do that, then you don't use the thing that is not available as a distraction.

When you get down to the business of living within each given moment, only looking at what's available, you do not create frustration because there is a/ways something to act on. If you look at the choices in front of you that can act on with integrity, there will always be one or more that will stand out.

So, you can use frustration to re-ground yourself to the moment. You can allow it to be of service to you exactly as it is by allowing it to point out to you that in that given moment, you are using your consciousness in a way that does not serve you toward moving forward.

Exciting Options Are in Front of You

What frustration tells you is that you are looking at what you cannot do in any given moment and feeling powerless. Instead, let go of what you cannot do, and then you can allow yourself to see more clearly what you can do. When you pick the most exciting thing that you can act on and do it, you get momentum moving.

When you act on that exciting choice, you create new results. Your reality changes. Intertwined with those changes and results are new options and new opportunities that may not have been there before. When you repeat this process by picking the most exciting choice again and again, and follow that path, you can quickly move toward the things you say you want.

For example, perhaps taking a walk is the most exciting that you can do. It may seem completely unrelated to the thing that excites you. Nevertheless, they are different facets of one expression. The way you can tell that they are related and that that action is important is because they both excite you. When you do what excites you in the moment, though it may seem unrelated to what you want, you are not wasting your moment. What is actually happening is that you are both having a good time and moving forward.

You generate momentum by choosing and acting on what excites you with integrity. This validates and honors your excitement. You generate a new momentum, and the new momentum, by definition, replaces the old momentum. Since you are acting on your excitement with integrity, you will create a preferential reality with built-in integrity.

Use the Wild Card in Any Situation

Though we have highlighted only three limiting interpretations: fear, anger, and frustration, the wild card can be used in any situation. Anytime you feel there is something in your life that does not belong, when you say “that does not belong,” you do not allow yourself access to it, and therefore, you do not allow it to be of service to you. Instead, when you say, “How does this serve me,” and not only “How does this serve me,” but “How does it serve me exactly the way it is?” Not “If it was only a little bit this or that,” but exactly the way it is.

When you use the wild card, you are using your creation to your fullest ability. When you look at the things you have created that seem negative and allow them to serve you, they deliver the message that they were created for. They then transform and change their face.

One of the greatest opportunities for you to use this is in the negative things that seem to be repeating themselves in your life. If some type of thing keeps happening, it is always anew, even if it doesn’t appear that way. It is always you who interprets it in the same way. Nothing is extraneous. Nothing is extra. Even that repetitive idea can be used in a positive way. All of it. There are no exceptions whatsoever. None.

How to Turn Negatives into Positives:

Part 1

We're going to explain how to turn the negative things in your life into positive things. Each and every one of you is the assignor of meaning in your reality. Allow us to explain and apply this in several areas.

You may have heard before that all situations and events are “a neutral set of props” that contain no built-in meaning. You assign that meaning. You are the assignor of meaning. The meaning that you assign determines the effect that you get out.

Perhaps you can say, prior to the assignment of that meaning, life is truly meaningless, but then you assign the meaning. The tone with which you assign that meaning determines the effect and experience you get out.

You Decide What's Positive or Negative

Given any neutral situation that occurs in your life, if you apply and assign a negative meaning, you in general, will then receive a negative effect. If you take the same situation, the same parameters, and place and assign a positive meaning by perhaps asking, "How does this serve me?" rather than "Why is this happening to me?" you then, from the very same set of neutral props, get a positive response and result.

You truly do create your reality, and you truly do set down the tone for doing so through your assignment of meaning and how you define your reality to be.

Example: Change Seems Complex

One of the definitions that people will often apply to their reality is that changing yourself is a long, complex process. We understand that your consciousness and your reality are rich and full of complexity and diversity, but how you live your actual life and make changes is actually quite simple. When you define that change as difficult, you act differently than if you assume change is simple.

After you assign the meaning, you act in a certain way, and it is those actions that create the physical effects in your physical life. It is always up to you. If you decide that things are quite complicated, you have assigned that meaning. If, instead, you assign the meaning of simplicity, you will then approach the situation differently. You will act in a way that reflects how simple and easy it is to change your life.

Change is a neutral idea. It is a constant in your reality. When you assign that it must be a complex series of steps or processes, you then act in a way where you go looking for processes. You will then only allow yourself to truly validate a change if there is first a process and you have worked to earn it. Instead, you can remind yourself that the moment you decide to change, you have changed. You do not need a process.

Example: A Cube

This can be illustrated by the following analogy. Imagine that you have a cube, and all sides of that cube are painted a particular color. Then you paint one side a slightly different color. There are two different ways to look at that one same neutral cube. One way is that it is the same cube with a slightly different change: same cube, different face. Another way, no less valid, is that it is an entirely different cube by definition.

If you reflect on this for a moment, it is obvious that both ideas are true. It is simply a matter of which one you assign to it and how you choose to look at it. The effect you get is determined by your assignment of meaning.

If you assign “it’s just the same cube with a slightly different side,” then your attitude toward that cube will reflect that, and you will get the effect of it being just the same cube. On the other hand, if you see it as an entirely different cube now and focus on seeing the differences, you will experience the same exact cube as fresh, fascinating, and as if it is new. All because you have simply chosen to look at it that way.

How Do You Choose to See It?

You can apply this, by extension, to your life and reality. If you make one little minor change, you can choose to look at it as the “same old boring life with a little tiny change” or an “entirely different reality, entirely different scenario, and set of events.”

Once anything has changed, it has all changed, and it is up to you how you will choose to look at it. If you choose to believe that it is easy to change your reality and if you interpret any change as a grand and sweeping change across the entire reality, you can then very quickly reap the benefits of that change in accelerated timing.

Assign the Meaning That It Has All Changed

When you make any change within yourself, if you assign that it has all changed, your actions are different from the actions that you would have taken if you believed it was just a slightly different change in the same old life. If you believed it to be the same life, with a slight change, you would then be looking for the similarities between the newly changed reality and the old reality. You would then perhaps say, “See, I told you it didn’t change.” But how could you have experienced it as a change when all you did in that instance was assign that it was really a very little change?

However, if you decide that fundamentally any change is a change across the board, that has you then looking and seeking to see the differences rather than the similarities. You can either allow the similarities to validate the lack of change or be very active in seeking out the differences to validate the change. The same set of circumstances, different assignments, and entirely different effects.

You Get to Decide

You are always able to be active in the assignment of meaning in your reality. It is up to you. You get to choose, and if you say, “It is not up to me,” that is your choice. That is the choice you have made. In any given moment, if you decide, “I have no choices,” you have made a choice.

Choose Consciously

If you decide that everything has changed, you will find a lot of fascination looking at the way things have changed. You will see the subtle differences and the evidence that corresponds to the change rather than the same old idea. Either way, you will be actively engaged in the process. What we are suggesting is that you can be conscious and purposeful about it and do it according to your intention rather than randomly.

Assign the Meaning You Prefer

You can approach any given situation in your life from the perspective that it has no built-in meaning. For example, if a particular situation comes along and, societally speaking, you have been taught that every time this situation occurs, it is bad; it is negative. “Oh, everyone knows that!” Then you assign it the “everyone knows” negative meaning and get the negative effect, and there's the evidence, "Well, everyone was right."

You can always turn this around. You can say and acknowledge what perhaps everyone usually says is wrong with the event, but not settle for that because you understand "I create my reality. I'm experiencing an event that is my creation. It seems on the surface to be quite bad; however, if I acknowledge my creator hood, I will look at why I created it, not look at the face of it to say, 'Well, of course, I would never create that.'"

Take Back Your Power

When something seems negative, you take back your power with this question, "How is this creation serving me exactly the way it is? It's quite clear what seems obvious and negative about it, but that does not serve me other than to remind me that I don't like it."

If you look a bit further, you will always find some way that any situation is a positive conscious service to you, but only, only if you decide that you wish to assign the meaning that it will be of service to you.

Consciously Assign Meaning

When you automatically say, "That's bad," you are assigning a meaning. The point is that you are very good at labeling things. We are not asking you to do something you're not very good at. We are simply pointing out that you can be conscious of it. If you like change, you can just decide to change. If you simply trust in that change, “I have decided to change; therefore, I know everything has changed. I demonstrate that I believe that by looking for the differences rather than the similarities.” The third step is to act as though you trust that it has changed. Those three steps allow you to transform the face of your reality 100%.

Remember, it can seem like a slight change within the huge totality that you are if that is how you choose to assign the meaning. Both are true. Both are valid. However, if you assign a more positive meaning, you get to have a more consciously useful result, and you allow your reality to transform.

Situations Are Messages

All situations in your life, including life itself, are a reflection of your consciousness. Anything within it is a message that you wish to explore. When you look at a given situation and try to figure out what the message is, then you will get service out of it. When you accept the service and then act or do whatever you can to express what you have gotten out of it, the situation transforms. There is no longer the need for the symbol delivering the message to hang around.

However, if you choose to deny the message, that message still exists within you. In general, you will then create circumstances that seem similar in order to bring them to your attention. This will often manifest in your life as negative patterns or repetitive negative occurrences.

If this happens, realize that, as with all other creations, you created it but are not deriving service from it. When you simply give it a negative label and tuck it back into the closet, that means it is still unresolved within you.

When you allow the symbols to deliver the meaning that you created them for, you allow them to fulfill their purpose. In the creative way that you create reality, these types of symbols that seem to keep coming around will then stop, and you will no longer create them.

Act Like a Creator

When you derive service and meaning from anything that exists in your life, you then use all your creations in a positive way. The more you act like a creator, the more you get evidence and feedback. This is because you have assigned the meaning that “I am the creator of my reality.” When you act that way, as in all other situations that you act on, you get the results and evidence that confirm “Yes, you do create your reality.”

You Are Experts

This is the exact same mechanism you are now using when you believe you don’t create your own life. You act a particular way, get a particular result, and then say, “See! There’s the evidence. Obviously, I don’t create my reality.”

The point is that you are experts at doing this. It does not take too much to simply move that point of view toward the conscious, desirous, positive intention. The intention of owning your reality aligns you with your ability to act in a positive way that midwives these concepts into the physical reality you call your life.

Your Actions Reflect the Assignment

Ultimately, your actions determine the result. You never perform actions in a vacuum. When you do something, you always have the assignment of meaning behind them. If you wish to create your life consciously, according to preference, be mindful of the fact that when you get a particular impression from a situation, you are the one assigning that impression. This puts it back into your grasp and gives you back your power to decide if that is truly the assignment you wish to make.

Pause Before You Act

You will often find that the assignments were “automatic.” But now that you know that it’s even a notion that the assignment occurs and then gives you the effect, you can always pause before acting and pause before you do anything. Regardless of the fact that you have viewed and evaluated the negative because you are only willing to act or do something when the positive perspective is in place, you will only get the positive effect.

This Reality Is One of Polarity

Remember that as your awareness and consciousness expands, you become more aware of anything that is within any reality that you create. This particular reality contains polarity: negative and positive. As you expand, your awareness of both will expand; however, your experience of both does not need to expand. What determines what you experience is the meanings that you assign and the actions you take as a result. If you only assign positive meaning across the board, you will only get positive effects. Your increased awareness of negativity will come in the form of negativity as experienced by others.

Action

The point is that there is a distinction between being aware of something and experiencing it. From your centered self, you can very safely view all the positives and negatives. None of it has any effect until you act. If you remain grounded enough to only act when having provided a positive alternative, the increasing awareness of negativity will be through others. You will still be aware of it. You will not be in a vacuum. You will still be in the reality that you have chosen to create. You will still experience the polarity in the form of awareness.

When you choose positive meanings and then perform correspondingly positive actions, the results of your actions are fruitful and can also be seen by others. You provide more opportunities and options for others to see that the positive perspective works.

When you embody these ideas rather than discuss what sounds nice, you provide the strongest example. The more you are willing to do this, the more you will attract other people who are also very excited about these ideas. You will very quickly see changes across the board, global changes.

Changing Yourself Changes Everything

Sometimes people think, “If I change myself, it makes little to no difference in the world around me.” Again, this is an assignment of a meaning. When you make a change, it all changes.

Consider this analogy. Imagine that you are a gear enmeshed with many other gears, where each gear represents the other billions of people on your planet. If you turn, all the gears turn, even if just a little bit. This is literally true for your actions. It affects everything across the board.

As we have said before, it is all a matter of perspective. If you say, “Changing myself has very little impact on the world around me,” then you act from that perspective. You will then only see evidence that you are the only one changing.

However, if you understand that a change in you is a change in the universe, which is you, then you will look for the differences and changes. You will have the eyes to see those changes. If you are very astute and aware of those changes, you will allow yourself to attract other people who will assist you.

Pay attention to where you assign meaning. Pay attention to how you define things. Be aware before you act what your foundational assignment of meaning is. That awareness will always either subtly or blatantly affect how you act. Even subtle negative assignments will affect how you act and can create subtle results you don't like. If you assign a subtle positive meaning, then the subtle result will be what you like.

It Is Up to You

It is truly up to you, and it always will be up to you to assign the meaning, remind yourself of your intention, and then act with that foundation. That literally creates your reality. In fact, this is how you have always created your reality and life.

If you want to change things, what we are suggesting is to be conscious of it. If you don't want to, just go about your business, and everything will automatically fall into place. What we are discussing here, though, is creating consciously and according to preference because you want to, and you know that acting on your own passion or excitement with integrity can only be of positive service to yourself and to those around you.

Our Relationship with You

Even when we interact with each other, each of you will assign your own meaning as to what we represent to you. It is never our intention to insist that we are who we say we are. It is unimportant to us that you believe that we are who we say we are. We say that because this places the weight on the message that we are delivering rather than the messenger, and at least up till now, in your society, there has been a penchant for latching onto the messenger, many times at the cost of the message itself.

We Desire to Share Self-Empowerment

What we desire to share is self-empowerment. That is what allows us to have a telepathic society. That is what allows us to function as one unit collectively without sacrificing individuality. We still maintain our individuality, but we still get things done in a positive way. We say this because we think it is attractive to your society.

Be Open-Minded

If you allow the message to be what's important while letting who's delivering it be a footnote, you can decide for yourself. Regardless if you choose to believe this or not, you will get something out of it. Either you will get something from what I am saying, or you will define yourself by deciding that it does not apply to you and automatically attract yourself more consciously or directly into whatever circumstance will then be of service to you.

We Enjoy Interacting with You

From our perspective, we simply cannot lose. We wish to revel in the exchange with you. We get quite a bit out of this as well. It allows us to see many more ways that "all that is," or what you call "God," expresses itself throughout the multi-verse.

This is one of our interests and fascinations. As sparks of the infinite yourself, you are quite fascinating to us. Though you may perceive that our focus is a bit more expanded than your own, this simply means that our chosen point of view is less focused, or limited. This does not mean, in any way, shape, or form, that we are better than you. No.

We Are All Equal

In general, there will be the assignment of meaning from members of your society that extraterrestrial races are better than humans. No. Perhaps, that very idea is one of the things that prevents us from interacting with you face-to-face on mass right now. It is not our intention to interact with you to have you give your power away to us.

Be an Example

You become living examples of the way that we live when you “pick up the ball,” as you say, “and run with it.” And, by extension, you become self-empowered and exercise your ability to respond—your response ability. When you take back the assignment of meaning, you own your power.

You Are Not Drowning

When you truly feel this way about yourself, and if we should land and interact with you, it will simply be a reunion, not “individuals coming down to save you.” However, that is not the point. You are not drowning. We understand and respect your choice of exploration.

You are allowed to reap the benefits of any exploration that you choose to experience. You can also reap the benefits of negative choices, although you don't generally look at it this way. You get the freewill to explore that.

Collectively speaking, as a society, you are now beginning to make more positive choices. The societies that are observing yours can see this in a blatant way. The day does grow closer when we can interact more blatantly.

We Will Probably Not Be First

We are not likely to be the first civilization that you will find out about on mass. There are one or two other civilizations that are more likely to be first. Pay attention to the media, and you will find some irrefutable evidence of the existence of extraterrestrial civilizations. Understand that this evidence has existed for many, many years but now is most likely the time that you will recognize it, in part because you can assign your own meanings.

How to Turn Negatives into Positives:

Part 2

We often speak about the mechanics and specific principles that will help you understand how you create your reality and how to make changes that will have your reality dovetail to one of preference. In this chapter, we will go into a bit more detail.

Interpretations Lead to Actions

When we speak to you about creating your reality, you can break much of what we discuss down to three ideas:

1. In your reality, in your life, and in the events of your particular experience, the first thing you will do is interpret a situation.
2. You will then, due to having assumed that interpretation, create an assumptive premise. You assume a particular attitude based on your particular interpretation.

Hello

3. You then take action from the particular attitude that arose from those particular interpretations.

Again, much of what we have shared with you can be simplified down into your interpretation of your reality, your attitude that you assume because of that interpretation, and then the actions that you take with the premise of that interpretation and attitude.

We hope you're following along. If not, you may wish to take a moment to review this.

Your Life Is Like a Play

As we have said before, all the events in your life have no built-in meaning. They are very literally a set of props. You could say that your life is an improv play that you are creating, and the events are simply a neutral set of props. They in and of themselves have no inherent meaning, nor "description" or "purpose." They are simply a neutral set of props. You are the one who interprets the props, assumes an attitude, and then acts.

Many of you are still very willing to interpret things negatively. Then with that negative interpretation, you get "upset." You assume the attitude of being "upset," and then you act. Obviously, those actions then yield, support, and reaffirm that your interpretation seems correct and like it is the only possible interpretation.

Again, we remind you, you are the one who chose to interpret it in that particular way. You always have the choice to at least also look at the positive interpretation.

From Negative to Neutral to Positive

You can start by relabeling your interpretations as neutral. Not that you should leave them there. When you have a tendency to label things as negative, labeling them as neutral is a bit more obtainable than finding the positive interpretation.

When you realize that a particular event you may be interpreting as negative has no built-in meaning, you can then be conscious and look at what is positive about it. This allows you to incorporate what you label your “un” or “subconscious” into your conscious awareness. It is very simple.

Blessings in Disguise

Another way to look at this is that you dress the events in your life. You dress them in various costumes if you will. If you are interpreting anything whatsoever as negative, then you are “disguising” that particular positive meaning from yourself.

That is why another title for this chapter would be “Blessings in Disguise.” The worst of what still seems to occur in your life is just that and no less than that. These things are not neutral symbols with a high degree of negative propensity that may possibly have some minute positive thing in there to placate you. No. You can think of it that way if you wish. But if you wish to be a bit more specific about the impact and just how much positive is contained within the neutral symbol, you will come to find that there is at least as much positive as negative. All neutral symbols have 100% potentiality to express negative or positive, depending on your interpretation, attitudes, and actions.

When something seems negative, you can not only say, “This is neutral,” but in fact, go one step further and say, “Well, in fact, this is a blessing, a blessing in disguise. This actually allows me to do something that I could not have done before.” When you do that, you will see that even by just looking for positive interpretations, they will blatantly present themselves.

Once you “cut yourself the slack” to interpret situations as positive, you then create the opportunity to create a positive assumptive attitude. With that new attitude and the very same set of props, the actions that you take can only yield a positive result.

That is physics. That is mechanics. What you put out is what you get back. You sometimes say, “As you sow, so shall you reap.” Whatever you wish to call it, that is one of the only true laws in creation that transcends all reality.

An Opportunity to Accelerate Your Life

You can quickly accelerate yourself if, from this point forward, you use what you feel to be the greatest liabilities that are left in your life in a positive way as blessings in disguise. You can undress those liabilities and see what undergarments lie under that overcoat of negativity you have assigned.

This is the time of transformation on your planet. It is very obvious. We don’t need to go into that. One of the factors that comes along with the degree of transformation that your mass consciousness has chosen is acceleration. That acceleration itself is also neutral. You can experience it in a myriad of ways. You could experience it as a negative experience but only if you continue to interpret and assume a negative attitude about it and act negatively.

Accelerate Your Life

Just simply being willing to even look at what blessing a negative experience might hold will accelerate you through the worst of what is left in your life. We remind you that you are a finite being, even though you exist within an infinite universe. You are exploring finiteness. What you consider to be a difficulty or negativity is finite as well.

It is not a “bottomless barrel.” The barrel has a very shallow bottom. When you face, acknowledge, and look at the negative beliefs that you are denying, you accelerate this process.

Interestingly enough, as you look at events as neutral and then assign positive meanings, you will find many things. One of those things will be how quickly you can accelerate through many of the old, somewhat obsolete beliefs that you have.

Relabeling Brings Up Other Limiting Beliefs

When you relabel negative things as positive, that will always bring to the surface old limiting beliefs that you no longer prefer. In general, this is because when you are in a neutral situation and label it negative, the reason you are doing that is because of some limiting belief that you still hold. Simply even being willing to begin to see what the positive is, more times than not, will bring that negative belief to the surface. Not only will you get a positive effect, but you will clean out your “subconscious closet.”

Blessings Are All Around You

Blessings are all around you. In fact, you are a blessing. You are a blessing, a blessed spark of the white light of infinite creation itself. Being that you extend directly from the Infinite Creator, you cannot help but always create, and you get to choose how you create.

By only using everything to your greatest advantage, you can allow all your creations to be of service to you, and you can transform the stockpile of negative beliefs. When you do, you will no longer ever experience negativity.

Since you are in a world where negativity is an option, expansion will also mean being more aware of the negativity, and so you very well may be aware of negativity in others. However, you absolutely will no longer experience anything as negative. Whatever you experience, you will simply no longer label it as negative. When you take creations that seem very easy to label negative and instead label them positive, you then generate only neutral situations, which are a bit more simple to label positive.

This is not about fooling yourself by relabeling the negatives. No. That is an option, but you do not have to. The face of your life will literally change once you begin to count your blessings, assemble them, and use them instead of turning them away or throwing them back into the face of infinite creation. It is always your choice, but the word “blessing,” in general, invokes a spark of knowingness.

Many times, you can simply say, “Alright, alright, alright. I understand that the situation seems negative. I understand that if I proceed with the attitude I have right now, it will give a negative result. But I am now remembering that this is a blessing in disguise; therefore, allow me to look a little bit more closely at it. It allows me to perhaps use it as just that, a blessing.”

Our Perspective

From our perspective, you are all blessings to us, although not necessarily in disguise. We revel, and it is our pleasure to interact with you in this way. These ideas work for us, and so we can present them to you. This is how we live. But again, we never insist that there is anything better about what we have to offer. We only sense that you are requesting this information.

As with all tools that you attract in your life, our suggestion would be:

1. Do not believe anything we say because it is we who say it. We cannot prove it to you. Only you can prove it to yourself. Understand, in no uncertain terms, that it is not our goal to change who you are. We do not judge who you are. We revel in who you are and already feel you are a blessing. You do not need to achieve blessing-ness.

Hello

2. No matter what you believe about yourselves, we believe in you utterly.

Conclusion

Thank you for your ongoing willingness to look under the disguises that you don and place on the events of your life. What you will always find in your search and in your consciousness is more of yourself. Creation occurs not to you but through and from you.

A Very Powerful Alignment Tool

When you are not sure how to find alignment, excitement can really help. We are about to share a very short exercise to help you do this. Allow it to be natural and effortless. This can help you define yourself more easily. Do not have any expectations about any particular outcome. Read the words as they are written and allow whatever naturally occurs to occur. If someone can read it to you, that may help. Allow whatever reaction or response that you have to happen. Simply have no “investment” in any specific outcome.

An Alignment Exercise

If you are listening, close your eyes. If not, follow along. At your own pace, in your own timing, take three deep and loving breaths, all the way in and all the way out.

As I have suggested, simply allow yourself in a calm state to simply read these words and allow anything that occurs to simply occur. There is no wrong way to do this.

Begin by imagining the feeling of being excited. Allow every cell of your body to express the emotion you call “excitement,” “passion,” or “pure joy.” Attach nothing to this. Simply drum up, imagine, and project without any background feedback. Simply feel the vibration of excitement.

Allow this to build up to whatever degree it naturally will. Feel every cell of your body bursting with motivation, incentive, inspiration, and pure excitement. Just imagine how that would feel. Allow yourself naturally, to whatever degree you feel it, to feel the excitement.

Understand, in no uncertain terms, that in order to imagine how it would feel to be excited, you literally create the excitement itself. There is not a one-step removal. When you imagine how it would feel to be excited, you are actually creating excitement. Allow yourself to validate what you feel, no matter what it is. Continue to focus your consciousness on the idea of allowing yourself, for no particular reason, to feel excitement as opposed to any other emotion.

Take a moment.

To whatever degree you have created whatever feeling that you are experiencing at this moment, notice the black screen from behind your forehead, the blank black screen that appears when you close your eyes. From the blackness or grayness, allow naturally at whatever pace is comfortable for you, for you to see yourself now that you feel excited, doing something. With the backdrop of the feeling of the emotion of excitement, see what it is that you are doing.

If this comes easily to you, all is well and good. If you feel that it is not “coming,” simply allow yourself to continue to feel the emotion of excitement and see whatever pictures or images do come to mind.

Notice how you are holding yourself. Notice how you are standing, sitting, or lying down. Notice what you are doing.

If there are other people in your vision, allow yourself to see your demeanor in interacting with them. Allow yourself to see the joyous and excited way they respond to you. Allow yourself to see the joyous and excited way that you respond to them.

In each instance, you will find that there is something in the scene that you would not have expected. Focus your attention on that unexpected aspect that you would not necessarily have thought would be there. Allow yourself to feel the joy of discovering that that unexpected element is something that also does excite you. Make a note of whatever it is, no matter how “blatant” or how subtle.

See how you hold yourself. See what you are doing that allows you to express your excitement. Notice that element that you did not expect in the picture also contributes to the vibration of the excitement that you are creating.

I remind you there is no incorrect way to do this. No matter what you are getting, it will suffice. Allow yourself to experience this for another moment.

Now gently, at whatever pace is comfortable for you, allow yourself to refocus your consciousness back to this space and “outside surroundings.” At your own pace, open your eyes and refocus your attention back to this moment.

Imagination Is One of Your Abilities

Imagination is an ability that allows you to project yourself in hypothetical terms. You can use it as a tool of alignment and to focus your consciousness in a specific way.

When you feel excited, if you see what you can do to express that feeling, you will create a model, skeleton, or template of the energy of your consciousness around which physical reality can layer itself. You do this all the time anyway. You always put out some template, generally in the form of rigid expectations, that your physical reality can then congeal, coagulate, and contract around.

Focus

When you focus your consciousness, you lay down a foundation. Understand, in no uncertain terms, that much of what we talk about in terms of creating an experience or a reality that you prefer boils down to focusing your consciousness.

You always focus your consciousness, whether or not it is purposeful, pointed, and intentional or whether it is completely scattered. The bottom line is you are always focused on something. The ability to focus is not an ability you need to muster, build, or strengthen. Simply by having an intention and committing to it, you can, at any given moment, direct that focus toward what you prefer. When you do that, you lay down a conscious personal template of who you are.

If you are willing to allow yourself to maintain that focus, then you will begin to experience the outer reflections of that decision and choice. If you consecutively shift your focus from purposeful, conscious, intentional focus to random, disempowered focus, you still get an effect. The effect is still a result of focus, but that focus is not consistently constructive toward the you that you know in your heart of hearts you wish to be, or more accurately, the you, who you know in your heart of hearts you already are.

Focus on What Excites You

As we have shared in previous chapters, as you begin to define who you are, you can factor in the vibratory state of excitement and see what you would be doing if you were excited and how you are expressing that excitement. That will always assist you in realigning to who it is you truly wish consciously to be. That is opposed to any other way that you might define yourself, such as through the eyes of others or your circumstances, which are highly interpretable and on which you often place a negative interpretation.

Remember, You Assign the Meaning

Remember, all circumstances are a neutral set of props with no built-in meaning. There may be certain societal tendencies to label things in a certain way, but you do not get that effect out of any circumstance until you assign the meaning and then act according to that expectation. When you do that, you create the self-fulfilling prophecy of a circumstance being negative.

Focus Positively

Once you create a positive image for yourself, you can then easily interpret circumstances through that image. It's not about denying any negative outer circumstances. Instead, it is about shifting your focus in order to allow the positive meaning to filter in more automatically and naturally.

When you determine who the preferred you is, and then decide that you will be that preferred you, and, in fact, already are that preferred you, your decision is registered across the board. It is now who you are until you change your decision.

When you interpret a circumstance as being a result of that decision rather than evidence contrary to that decision, you can then learn from the circumstance rather than use it as evidence that you are not moving, not growing, and not changing.

Interpreting Reality as the Preferred You

When you remain focused on who it is you desire to be, you will interpret your circumstances through the eyes and senses of that preferred you. The moment you decide, "I am this preferred self," you already are that person. All circumstances can only be a reflection of that decision.

At first, because of your previous tendencies, you may have to consciously remind yourself who you are and interpret all circumstances from the perspective of “How does this serve me? How does this reinforce my decision?”

Even though there may be some things that would seem to contradict it, that obviously is not the point. “The me that I now am is supported by my circumstances, is supported by my relationships, and is supported by my experience. I interpret my experience from the perspective of the preferred me.”

You Already Do This

You are already doing what we are saying, even if the way you do it is by constantly shifting your focus. Sometimes individuals will say, “I choose to be this empowered being,” but then a circumstance comes along that is neutral, but there are certain elements of it that could be, even though they don’t need to be, interpreted as evidence that, “Well I’m not that person.” But never, never, never is that the only meaning that you can get from a circumstance.

There Is Always a Positive Perspective

There are always, always, always, in every circumstance aspects of it, usually by the way very blatant, so you only need to open your eyes and look for them, that will absolutely support your new decision of who you are. When you focus on those aspects, you place less significance on the more negative seeming aspects.

In other words, you have the ability to interpret all circumstances as negative or positive, no matter what. Even the most positive thing that you can imagine, if you played the game of saying, “Alright, what would a pessimist find wrong with this,” you will find something. A circumstance is a neutral situation and a reflection of who you are. Who you are is not the result of your circumstances. That is how circumstance works. Circumstances always contain the infinite potential to be interpreted in either way.

It’s Not Rose-Colored Glasses

Often when we discuss this, people will say, “Well, simply what you are doing is telling me to look at the world through rose-colored glasses and deny the things that I know are negative in my experience.” This is not precisely what we are saying. We are not saying to avoid looking at the negative aspects but simply instead to focus on, concentrate on, and intend to find the positive aspects.

That is not about running from a seeming negative aspect. Instead, it is simply walking toward the positive aspects, and this automatically distances you from any negative seeming component of an experience. It is exercising your ability to choose who you are and not seeing the world in a distorted way.

In fact, one might argue that continuing to place negative interpretations on all circumstances is more inherently distorted since you are inherently positive creative consciousness beings. In many ways, your more natural tendency is to actually express the positive. And you can do so while being aware that there are negative aspects.

It's Not Denial But Acceptance

You don't need to deny them. You can say, "Well, I might have labeled all or part of this experience as negative, but obviously, that's not the point of the experience because I'm now this focused conscious preferred person, and therefore, the negative is not what I will focus on. I know all circumstance always contains both, and I can focus on the positive."

Generally, you can allow the positive of any circumstance to come to the surface by asking yourself, "How does this serve me exactly the way it is," as opposed to asking, "Why is this happening to me? Poor little old me."

Your Personal Template

This is all a matter of taking what you already do so well: focus and have that focus be consistent. This is your personal template: the conscious, purposeful, excited, integrated version of who you know yourself to be.

By allowing yourself to define that, you create your personal template. When we did the excitement exercise, most of you, in playing along with me, saw yourself doing things, saw unexpected aspects, and saw joyous aspects of the things that you were doing. Perhaps many of you said, "Well, I knew that excited me." Perhaps many of you also said, "I didn't know I was excited about that," and discovered something new.

You Are the Only One Who Knows You

You are the only one who knows who you are. You are the only one who knows how it feels to be excited in the way you do. At any point in time, you can always produce the sensation of excitement. It might even be in a once-removed way, by saying, “I will imagine how it would feel to be excited.” But once you drum up any sensation of the excitement, you are no longer imagining it. You are creating it. You are being it. You are using your imagination to do so.

The moment you feel it, you are the excitement itself. If you then see what types of things you would do, being and feeling excited, you create an alignment within yourself that honors who you know yourself to be, as you say, “in your heart.”

Your Focus Can Be Conscious

You always have the option of your focus being a conscious choice and not a set of circumstances dictated to you by the reality that you’ve been thrust and locked into. When you think that you are trapped in this reality, and when you think that you are an inherently negative being, you are simply focusing on the negative. If you experience that from time to time, it is because your focus shifts.

You don’t need to “panic” if your focus shifts. Simply realizing that your focus has shifted, you must be back into your original consciousness to see the difference; otherwise, you wouldn’t even notice that it has shifted. When you notice that you have shifted to a more negative perspective, that is the same as now being back in the positive perspective but allowing you to remain there consciously. Because you recognize it, you must have a positive perspective. You couldn't recognize the negative without knowing the positive.

Change Your Focus, Change Your Life

If you assign a negative meaning, you will get a negative effect. In addition, you will often not allow yourself to have the advantage of the positive aspect of the circumstance. The converse is also true. When you assign a positive meaning and come up with a positive definition, you will get support out of it. The effect you get out of it is reinforcement, reinforcement of who you've chosen to be. As we have said, you will always focus your consciousness somewhere, and if you are not doing it consciously, then you are doing it randomly. A lack of focus may appear to be happening unconsciously, but that is a shell game of consciousness. You are actually consciously deciding not to focus.

Conscious decision is simply doing this because "I say so," because "I know this is who I am," because "I am awake, aware, and lucid of who I am." When you wake up to who you are, your life becomes a lucid dream, which it already is from time to time.

Now is the time and threshold for getting ahold of the fact that you are always expressing yourself in some way and always focusing your consciousness in some way. It is also the time to act like a creator, at least in terms of being aware of who you are and knowing that who you are is supported by your circumstances and experiences.

At first, when you need to look for how a circumstance supports you, you will quickly see that all circumstances always do. As your natural tendency becomes to first interpret things positively, the things you would have formerly defined as negative will seem to disappear.

You will see the neutral props change and have the appearance of being more positive, even though they are still literally just as neutral. The face of the circumstance and experience changes when you change your focus, and here's the key: maintain that focus.

Decide, Trust, and then Act

All of this is simply a slightly different wording of the concepts we have stated over and over. First, you make a decision about who you are, then you maintain that decision, and lastly, you then act. You are aligning and acting according to who you know yourself to be rather than in alignment with the negative circumstances, which by the way, you have defined as negative.

What we are introducing is focus. This is another way to make life simple. When you are negatively aligned for any reason, you can always remember, "I am focused on the negative. The reason I am doing that is because I am focusing on a negative version of myself. Reality is not betraying me. In fact, it is supporting me by letting me know that I am focused on something negative. Simply realizing that lets me know that I must be coming from a place in which I can see the difference, and that is an empowered space.” At that point, it is effortless to shift your focus back to where you want it.

From Shifting Focus to Consistent Focus

When you find yourself saying, “Things are going well! They are not going well! They’re going well! They are not going well,” it doesn’t mean you are in a treadmill reality. That happens because you are shifting your focus back and forth. “I am a conscious being. I am a random being. I am a being where the reality comes from me. I am a being who exists within a reality as a victim of it.” That is shifting your focus.

You can never have a negative experience or interpretation unless you are focused on the negative aspects of yourself. In that case, you are allowing your interpretation to be negative.

It’s Simple

The reason that this sounds so simple is because it is. The other reason that it sounds so simple is because you are masters and experts at focus. Although perhaps to this point you have been masters and experts at random, follow the bouncing ball, focus. What we are suggesting is consistency.

By the way, consistency and persistence do not need to be difficult. It is actually far more natural and effortless to express your positive understanding. This is because all things are integral, interwoven, and integrated and come from your consciousness rather than the other way around.

Stability

You can enjoy life as if you are in a reality, and you can explore your consciousness from the physical point of view. At the same time, you don't need to create a rollercoaster ride of results and emotionality unless, of course, that excites you, and for some of you, it does.

You Can't Backslide

Sometimes people fear that if they are not consistent that they have failed altogether. The truth is that you can't really forget what you've discovered about who you are. Life can't really slip away from you. You can't really backslide to who you were. This is because you always have more information than you did before. You are inherently different than who you were. You can play the game of "I am this old me again," but you are truly this old you plus. When you realize this, you can realign, shift, and re-point your focus consciously.

Maintain Positive Focus

Here is my promise to you all, if you maintain your positive focus of the excited, creative, inspired, productive you, no matter what, and if you interpret all of your experience through the eyes of that preferred you, your life will instantaneously totally 100% without exception shift and stay there. This is how integral you are in establishing your experience. This is what we literally mean by the phrase "create your reality."

For the purposes of this discussion, at least you create your experience, which can be consistently positive, even though you may have an awareness of negativity. That awareness will be others choosing to focus and express negativity, and not you. That is not denial. That is willing to be aware of both polarities but consciously choosing to express the positive polarity.

Reality Reflects Your Focus

You contain it all. There is no outside. If you feel that you learn something or if you feel that someone else inspires you, that is a misconception. Everything that you interact with and perceive is a reflection of your consciousness. It is a reflection of how you are focusing your consciousness, which only you determine. That is your power on a silver plate. Only you determine your focus. If you say, "I am unfocused," you are focusing on randomness.

You create the people that you interact with. When you express yourself positively, they have a reason to be there. When you change the way you express yourself, people will seem to change. That's because you are actually seeing and interpreting them and their actions differently and as the new you.

This all goes back to the point that as you change, and as you change your focus, others seem to change as well. Circumstances seem to change. Experience seems to change. In the end, though, really, it is only you changing your focus and then allowing reality to reflect that, which it does flawlessly every single time.

Relationships Become Effortless

When you interact with people, you don't need to insist that they share your perspective. You don't need to impose your focus on them. You may present it, yes. You did attract them for a reason. Although perhaps the reason you attracted them is simply to share what has worked for you.

The only thing you need to do is to give them a clear description of what has worked for you, why it has worked for you, and how it has worked for you. That's all you need to do. You don't need to insist that the person must then do what you do. You don't need to insist that what you are doing is any better than what they are doing. Even though you may be getting positive results, in the end, all choices, all results, and all circumstances, in a qualitative sense, are equal.

You can simply present who you are without any investment that the other person needs to do what you're saying. This allows you to express yourself effortlessly, with no pressure. It also allows you to be responsible to them without also feeling responsible for them. Only they can be responsible for themselves, just as you are ultimately responsible for yourself as well.

Everyone Is Perfect

When we communicate with you, this is why we have the attitude that our job, per se, is to state who we are, to interact with the reflections that we attract, with absolutely no investment that you change, and with absolutely no interpretation that there's anything wrong with the way you are expressing yourself. To me, you are all 100% perfect beings.

Perfection is not something to strive for. Your society may believe that there is some ideal to strive for, but fundamentally you are all perfection in motion. You are a perfect reflection at any given moment of whatever it is you are expressing at that moment. Since you are finite, what that means is that it will be different for each of you.

There is no one definition of perfection that takes everything into consideration. You don't need to strive to be who you are. Simply allow yourself to get in touch with who you are. That lays down the template, the skeleton, if you will, on which your reality and your relationships then appear to build themselves.

Be Conscious About How You Focus Yourself

No matter what your state of awareness is or what your circumstances are at this moment, this has already happened. You have laid down some template in your consciousness, again generally not on purpose or fully focused, and then you have allowed reality to build itself around it.

What we are discussing now is the age of being conscious about it. We are suggesting that you allow the template to be a statement that you make about who you are rather than an interpretation of who you are based on the reflections of the external reality.

You Contain It All

Conversely, when you hear something that you enjoy or when you feel that you have learned something new, it is truly something you already knew and are simply now willing to look at. You realize that now is the time to know it.

You are fundamentally an infinite being that contains everything, no exception. The apparency of evolution, growth, or expansion is simply experiences that you choose to create because it's there as an option. But it is an illusion. You are already fundamentally all-knowing and all-seeing.

When you understand this and trust who you are fundamentally, you will know that in any given circumstance or situation, you always have all the tools and know what you need to know when you need to know it. You do not have to gain something to be who you prefer. You can simply express yourself as the person you prefer.

Conclusion

From my perspective, you are all reflections of my consciousness. Anything you reflect to me allows me to learn more about myself. This is also true, paradoxically, for all of you. You are the creator, you are the center, and we are all the reflections within your consciousness.

“How can this be?” you ask. “How can we all be this?” That is the nature of infinity. That is the nature of moving beyond what you have considered being the finite boundaries of reality. This is generally what you refer to as a paradox.

Things that wouldn't seem to be able to exist at the same time simultaneously indeed do, and that's that.

Everyone experiences reality as being from them, and everyone is absolutely correct, no matter how baffling this may seem. You will experientially understand this more and more. From a personal point of view, all that is important is what you are creating, how you are focusing your consciousness, how you are interpreting your reality, and how you are then walking in action and putting that out in your reality. It's all up to you.

An Extremely Powerful Tool: The Referential Preferential You

Your imagination is one of the primary tools that you can use to create the life that you wish. It lays down the template, model, and mold that enables you to build and be that very life. We call this mold the referential preferential you. Many of you have, on some level, understood what we have said and seen the usefulness of it. At the same time, we find that many of you still view it as just a concept, or notion, that would be nice if it were only true. This tool will enable you to jump that gap.

The Power of the Imagination

Here we will help you form your own version of that referential preferential you. We remind you that in your society, imagination is generally used as a generator of fantasies, either in the form of an escape or a vision that you truly feel will never happen. But that is only one side of the coin.

When you view the imagination as a tool, you will see that it is very, very, very specific, personalized, and tailored to you. The referential preferential you is “the you that you wish you could be.” By using your imagination, together, we will form the mold. Together, we will form the birth of this you and then describe some applications of it.

A Guided Meditation

In your own time, become comfortable in your seat. Understand that what you are about to create, and perhaps for many of you recreate, will be something that will stick around. Since it is your creation, no one can take it from you. Since it comes from you, you will never need anyone else in order to call it forth. It is, by its very creation, by its very identification from you, a tool of empowerment. Once you have it, you can never lose it. It requires no one else in order to express it. It is part and parcel of you.

It may help to have someone read what follows to you as a meditation. If not, read along.

In order to create a conducive atmosphere for the creation of this referential preferential you and at the same time unify, unitize, and align, take three deep and loving breaths. Close your eyes. As you relax and settle into yourself, blank the screen of your imagination and allow yourself to perceive the black behind your closed eyes.

Before we proceed, understand that there is no way to do this incorrectly, and in fact, your imagination, being that that's the screen that you are looking at right now, will assist you. Trust that that assistance is part of the very tool that we are speaking of. Allow whatever embellishments occur from your imagination to be the exact embellishment that makes it that much more relevant to you.

We will begin by allowing to emerge from this blackness, again at whatever pace is natural and comfortable for you, the outline of your body. If there is something that you would physically like to alter about your body, allow that outline to represent any changes.

If you feel you're a bit too thin, then picture it being a bit more robust, and vice versa. In any way, have this outline be for the you that you prefer to be, but do not remove it from yourself. Understand that you see you. As you begin to perceive against the background of the blackness the outline figure of your body, allow it to be slightly backlit by a blue-white light so that it stands out that much more. You can see the difference between perhaps the blackness within the outline and the background by that demarcation line of blue-white light.

Allow the features, color, and typography of the front of the body to begin to crystallize and see the you that you say you prefer to be. For some people, this will look exactly like the you you already are. That is just fine. If it does not, that is just fine as well. Do not lose the identification of what you see, particularly if it differs a bit from what you see in your mirror.

Starting at the top of your head, scan very slowly downward and allow the details and “fine print,” so to speak, to crystallize. See a bit at a time, from the top of your head, your “hair.” See that hair. How does it look? “How is it hanging” as you say, being that this is a bit foreign to us.

Allow yourself to slowly scan down to your forehead and eye region and begin to very clearly and discreetly in whatever way that is presented from your imagination to see that you. Allow that to crystallize and become more solid and clear. As you do so, allow this to wash downward to complete the nose, to complete the mouth, and the outline of the chin. See your face, the face of the you that you say you wish to be.

Allow that scanning to continue downward and allow the outline of what you call your neck to take on more substance. See the lines and the musculature within that neck. Still maintaining the focus on the face.

As you now have the head and neck, to whatever degree you have allowed yourself to create it, proceed downward and see the outline of your shoulders. See the outline of where your hands and arms join to the trunk of your body. Continue downward and allow yourself to see your chest, your ribcage area, and your abdominal umbilical area. Notice the nuances. Notice the details. Notice the similarity from who you now create yourself to be, and if there are any differences, notice those as well.

Overall, what we are suggesting for you to be creating in your imagination is the you that you prefer to be, not the you that everyone else says you should be. See the you that you feel comfortable being and that you know is right for you. Do not allow anyone else's opinion, for now, to enter into it. It is your projection of who you feel you comfortably are, not what everyone else says you should be.

Continue down to your pelvic area and allow yourself to begin to see, taking form, taking shape, the contours of your upper legs, your knees, your lower legs, and your feet.

Pan back and begin by taking a few steps back from the point of view that you are in order to see the whole self: the entire body, head, middle, legs, and feet. See it standing there in relief against the black background, backlit by a blue-white hue of light.

Now, picture a road. It can be any road you wish. If there is a specific road, fine. If it is simply blacktop, fine. Picture now that you are placed on this road, walking. This is the you you say you prefer to be. Look at how you are walking. Look at how you are standing. Look at how that holds up, down, or whatever, your head. See how your shoulders are held. See the language that your body exudes as it walks down the road: confident, assured, in ecstatic joy for simply being, for simply existing, for simply living the result of the choice of your soul to create this life. See the joy in you, simply walking. Notice the nuances.

As you do, notice again the similarity to the way that you walk. But, also pay particular attention to the differences, the differences in the way the head is held, the way the shoulders are held, the way the arms swing, the message, and the language that the body puts out. Note what is different about what this imagination is providing you in this reference point, in this referential preferential you, and again make note of them.

Now, imagine that, that you are walking on this road and are coming up to three other people having a conversation. It doesn't matter what they are saying, but two of them seem to be somewhat serene, and one is somewhat argumentative. Allow that preferential you to walk up to this interaction with the three other people. Allow yourself to see how you are participating in that interaction, how the referential preferential you holds and maintains, in conviction, that posture and is not strayed away from the center that you hold, and how it holds itself in a particular way when facing the serene people, but also when facing the argumentative person. Pay particular attention to how that you, in whatever the specifics of the situation that you are creating, handled that situation.

This is the you that you always have said you preferred to be, so I assume that you would be doing the things you say you wish you would do. So, allow your imagination to provide the specific stance and body language that accompanies that idea. See this you. Feel admiration for that approach, for that approach is representative of who you choose to be.

Picture that you are now continuing down the road. As you do, on your right side, imagine a calm, peaceful, serene, and perhaps colorful scenery. On your left, imagine warfare. The you that you truly prefer to be will have a similar posture when looking to the right and to the left. Analyze, as clearly as your imagination provides, your particular reaction from the preferred point of view of that you, and pay particular attention to the differences in how that you handled and interpreted the situation.

Allow that you to now face the serene side of the road, having the more tumultuous side to your back. When you perceive that beauty, perfection, and particular expression and manifestation of your nature, allow the feelings that that you would have to come to the surface and feel the feeling of fitting in. Feel the feeling of harmony. Feel the feeling of unconditional love and acceptance. That is the scenario that you have chosen to exist within for the time being.

When you truly feel what I am sharing, allow yourself to now turn 180 degrees, putting the serene theme in the back, and now view any version of warfare and tumultuousness on your planet, but notice the following: This preferential you, this reference point still feels that same joy, unconditional love, and connection, however, perhaps is expressing it from the viewpoint "Well, that's their story."

You are not invalidating it, but you understand that that fits as well, but it is just not representative of the you that you say you prefer to be. At the same time, you can understand that it serves a function for other people who are still exploring separation, limitation, and negativity. They, too, have the right and reason to explore that. Notice the lack of effect from that scenario, and in fact, you are able to maintain your centered self-understanding that the serenity surrounds you as well from the back.

Allow that you to once again turn to face the front of the road and begin once again to walk. Perhaps now into a fog, whereby there is no longer a discernible difference between one side and the other. As you walk, you come upon a chair or something similar to what you are sitting on now. Allow yourself to sit in it with a permeation of fog around you. As you feel yourself sitting in the chair, as you see that you are sitting in that chair, become that you in the chair. Now, take your point of view and perhaps sit on the lap of that referential preferential you. You will notice that you sink into that you and merge with that you. Allow your viewpoint to shift from viewing that you to sitting in the seat of that you and viewing from that you.

Decide You Are That You

Understand the following: You are that you. All that you need to do is decide that you already are that you. Just decide. The decision to become that you is a conscious act.

In order to create all of these images and situations within your imagination, you must, in the moment that you are doing so, become the idea itself; otherwise, you would not have the ability to bring it forth. You are this you. By the mere feeling and conjuring up of this you and experience of this you, you are that very you. Just decide that this is so for you.

Once you have decided to change, in order to maintain this posture and point of view, there are merely two more steps left. The first step was to just decide. The second is to trust that you have changed. Assume the attitude and expectations of the you that has changed, not that the you that wishes to change, that is looking for the evidence of why you have not and accepting evidence that you have not. The you that is that you would accept no evidence. The accepting of the evidence that it is not that you is the old belief system. The trust in the new you is the creation of the new belief system. The new you now looks from that point of view and now acts as that you would act.

And in fact, that is step three: to act as though you trust that you have changed. That means when something comes along that would seem on the surface to say, “You have not changed,” understand that when you even interpret “I have not changed,” that is not the new you trusting in the change; that is the old you seeing whether you really believe in the change. But you can simply reacclimate, reorient your consciousness, to simply decide to trust in the change.

Allow yourself to understand that the chair in which you sit, is the chair that you are sitting on. As the fog dissipates around you, allow yourself to reacclimate to the room. You have sat in the very chair that you are now in.

At your own pace, reacclimate to your surroundings. Then, open your eyes if they were closed.

You have changed because you are a conscious creator and have simply chosen to change. You can express this belief that you have changed by acting from the perspective of the changed self.

Your Referential Preferential You

Through this exercise, you have created a model. You have created a mold or a template. We call this the “referential” since you can refer to it at any time, and “preferential” since you prefer it, “you.” It can come in quite handy in your daily life.

Here is how you use it. If a situation comes along, it may not, but if it does, where you feel on some level that your initial reaction is a reaction to a situation rather than a conscious action, do the following. At first, simply note that you are perhaps thinking about proceeding according to an unpreferred perspective. Realize that you are about to do something that is not representative of who you say you wish to be. In whatever way is possible under the circumstances, call forth the referential preferential you.

This you has substance. It has mass. Hand the situation over to that you, the you that was standing in that particular way, the you that was holding themselves in that particular way, the you that went interacting with other people and maintained that resolve and joy, the you that when moving through the polarity of your particular physical reality, negative and positive, simply chooses the positive, acknowledges the existence of the negative polarity, because that is one of the definitions of the reality, but chooses the positive. Hand that situation over. See with the specifics of whatever the situation is what that you does. Very, very simple.

A Powerful Tool

When you turn that situation over to that you, that you will often surprise you, just as when we performed the exercise, there were some nuances about that you, that you had not anticipated. That is what your imagination contains as a tool—the ability to bring forth these specifics and apply them to a specific situation.

With this tool, you no longer need anyone else's help. This does not mean you cannot share, nor that, from time to time, you will not enlist the assistance of others, but you now have within you everything you need to proceed in any given situation. If you will call forth and embody and empower that preferred you.

Initially, It Might Seem like a Process

At first, it may seem like a process, and “Well, my initial tendency is still the old approach.” The more times you call forth the referential preferential you instead of acting from the old perspective, the more times you give yourself the opportunity to see that there is always, always a positive choice. Plus, you always have access to it at any time.

When you hand a situation over to that referential preferential you and see what that you does, if you then do that, you will get the result of being that you. The more you do so, living your life consciously, the more the process will dissolve, and it will no longer seem like a process. You will automatically invoke and embody that you without the one-step removal.

This tool may initially seem like a process, but that's only because you are inserting a pause before you act in a way you don't prefer. That pause is all that is necessary to completely transform the face of your life. It does not take very many positive actions in a row to yield positive results, which build up enough of a positive momentum to seem to overwhelm the “old non-preferred” negative momentum.

Walk Toward Your Positive Self

All of this is not a matter of walking or perhaps running from the negative self but instead walking toward the positive self. When you do that, there is automatically a distance from the negative experiential self. You will still be aware of negativity while you’re in this reality, but that will be in terms of someone else’s experience and story. “My story is the positive alternative to their story, which I validate. Their reality has the right to be, but it is not my choice. I do not criticize it. I do not judge the other realities, I simply embody my own reality as an alternative, as a statement to the universe, as a statement to myself, as a statement to those around me, that this is possible, for it is.”

This Is How We Live

This is how we live. From our perspective, we enjoy this approach, and we wish to share it with you. The fact that you understand proves beyond the shadow of a doubt, at least to us, that you are eminently capable of doing it.

Your Physical Body Will Change

If you want, you can just put this tool back in the closet to gather dust. However, you can also call it forth at any time. If you do, you will find, after a period of time, that you no longer need to call it forth because you will embody it. It will be you. When you look in your mirror, you will begin to see something very curious occurring. You will begin to see the physical you changing.

The changes may appear to be only on the surface, but it is far more than that. It is a literal redefining and reassigning of your genetic core as well. Your body is a reflection of your consciousness. When you change your consciousness, especially if you do so drastically and across the board, there cannot be any other effect than that body, which is a reflection and representation of that, to fall in step with it and embody the you that you now are.

You don't need to worry about it, though. When you are who you say you wish to be, it will automatically happen in its own timing. Notice the changes when they occur. When they do not, simply move on. There will be periods where it seems more accelerated, and there will be other periods where it seems less accelerated. The process can literally entirely redefine your physical body anywhere from three days to three years. It is up to you.

If you do not put pressure on yourself and instead allow yourself to be the preferred you without forcing it, then things will happen a bit more quickly. If, on the other hand, you obsess and get anxious about it, you may slow down your own process. Whether or not your physical body changes in and of itself is not really the point. It's an effect. It is a result of the changing of your consciousness.

This will take the form that, up until now, would have seemed drastic to your society. “Well, it’s not possible,” many might say, but you will show them that not only is it possible, but “Here I am.”

Conclusion

In exchange for your willingness to redefine yourself, or perhaps restate yourself, if you’re already happy with how you are, I thank you. One of the only universal constants is change itself. That is automatic. You don’t need to force anything to change. Forcing something has the effect of making things seem to stay the same. On the other hand, allowing and relaxing releases your reality and allows it to conform through the natural mechanism of change, which again is constant.

If you find yourself forcing, close your eyes, conjure up that you. I assume that you would not force things, and it will show you an alternative viewpoint, an alternative posture, an alternative point of view that will then give you one more choice. That choice, if you choose it, will be the result of being that preferred you. Each time you mimic the referential preferential you, you are being the referential preferential you. Then you will drop the designation “referential” and be the preferential you. Then you will be a reference point for others who wish to change.

How to Clarify Your Vision

This chapter is the first of a three-part series. In the next chapter, we will discuss your definitions and deservability. In the third chapter, we will discuss action. We have discussed many times that you create your reality. We have discussed many times that creating your reality, according to preference, is simply a matter of a slight shift in perception. You already create your reality, and it is now merely a matter of whether you want to continue to do so automatically, randomly, and “hodge-podge” or if you want to take responsibility and create your reality according to preference in joy and from desire.

Clear Intention

All that it takes to line or align your reality according to your preference is the clarity of your vision. One other way to put this is a clear intention. However, for now, we will refer to this simply as your vision. That being the thing, the event that excites you the most.

As we have reminded you, perhaps, many times, though, it is always the first time for us. Your excitement is a direct indication of who you chose to be in this life. This applies to the most exciting thing that you feel you may ever do, and it also applies, again, “microcosmically” to what’s available in any given moment, using that vibration, that perceptive sense, that you have, your excitement, to determine what is most you, and then act on that option with integrity.

Excitement

We will, for the purposes of alignment, focus more on the concept of the thing that excites you the most. This is in contrast to what we usually discuss, which is to focus your attention on what’s available in the moment. However, lining up and aligning with the most exciting thing overall directly affects what occurs in the moment. It allows whatever occurs in any given moment to actually be a stepping-stone toward the most exciting thing.

If you want to create your reality more consciously according to preference, then allow yourself to fully, fully acknowledge the thing that excites you the most. This sets up that clear intention and what you might refer to as the vision. This is one of the overall general themes or purposes in your life.

When aligning with that most exciting thing, your moment-to-moment reality begins to reflect this alignment. And, although the things in a given moment may seem to have nothing to do with the most exciting thing, when you decide on the clarity of that vision, each moment then has something directly to do with that vision.

What excites you in any given moment will change. The things that will excite you will now be representative of the path of least resistance toward that most exciting thing. In other words, it lays down a foundation. We are not in any way suggesting by this that you do this at the cost of remaining grounded in the moment. We are simply saying that you can use it as a compass, pointer, and barometer as to where these moments will ultimately lead.

A Clarification Exercise

I am going to ask you a question, perhaps rhetorical for now. When I ask it, allow your mind to furnish you with whatever comes up without any judgment or analysis. If it seems ridiculous or runs contrary to your “normal” point of view, allow it. When I ask this question, note what comes up for you.

We hope you’re paying attention.

The question is this, and I am asking each and every one of you this question personally, so, therefore, factor everyone else out. This is your question. What comes up on the screen of your imagination will be your answer.

What truly excites you the most?

Allow yourself to breathe and allow yourself in, once again, the theater of your imagination to provide any symbol or any impression that comes up. We will allow a moment for this.

Times up!

Now, from time to time, when we interact with members of your society, not to draw any conclusions from this, not to make any generalizations, but people will say, “Well, I do not know what excites me,” to which we will always reply: “Yes, you do.”

First of all, understand in no uncertain terms that you know what excites you. When you say that you do not, you are withholding your ability to access what you all already know. What we have not shared is that people who would seem to not be privy to what excites them will generally withhold that impression from themselves for one of three general reasons.

Reason 1: Judgment by Society

Reason number one: judgment of that thing by your society. More accurately, you’re buying into the judgment about the exciting thing your society seems to heap on it. It is never a product of their judgment that prevents you from doing anything. Their judgment can never have any effect on you whatsoever until you match or create your version of their judgment in the form of self-judgment: “Well, everyone knows you can’t do that.” This is why we say, “No matter how seemingly ridiculous it may seem when asking yourself: ‘What excites me?’ allow anything to come up.”

Reason 2: You Fear You Cannot Have It

Reason number two is the “fear” that you cannot achieve what excites you. I remind you that this is a paradox. The fact that it excites you tells you and is the indication of your prerequisite ability to do that thing; so, it is a paradox.

Remind yourself of this. Your excitement not only tells you that this is most you but, by extension, that obviously, you have the ability to do this thing. There are no dangling carrots in creation other than the ones you choose to create. The mere fact that it excites you allows you to know, in no uncertain terms, that though it may not be obvious in that moment how this thing can come about, “my excitement tells me it absolutely can.”

Reason 3: You Cannot Handle It

Reason number three is the general overall feeling that once a person achieves the thing that excites them that they will not have the ability to actually do that thing. They feel that they actually do not have enough power or fear quite the opposite, that they could not handle the power that would come along with the fulfillment of that exciting thing.

I remind you, simply, that there is nothing you can ever create that you cannot handle; otherwise, there would be extraneous creation, and there is not. Everything, by virtue of the fact that it exists, tells you, by definition, that it belongs. After all, you created it all.

Excitement delivers a message. Number one, it tells you you can do that thing; number two, it tells you that when doing that thing, you will have more than enough power to continue to do that thing and that that power can never overcome you, for it is an expression of you.

If you find that when you ask yourself, “What excites me the most,” these barriers come up, dialog with yourself, using what we have just shared, and ask yourself again, “What excites me the most?” Allow it to come up, allow yourself to feel it, and allow yourself to validate it.

Clear Intention Creates a Template

Though you perceive yourself as physical matter, you are energy, and you are consciousness itself. You are literally a wavelength, a frequency, and a spectrum of energy. When you establish your clear vision, you conform the frequency of your reality to the frequency of your desire.

This is not merely a mental exercise to clarify and establish your clear intention. It is literally the initiating step that sets up the energy template and the model that your reality then grows on. It is not merely an exercise but a foundational statement of conscious creator-hood.

If you are willing to acknowledge what moves you and what excites you, you are clarifying your vision; you are focusing on the overall idea that right now is most representative of who you are.

It is like dialing a phone number or entering a particular address into the GPS; it tunes you to the preference of what exists in your reality. We cannot emphasize enough that allowing yourself to be aware of what excites you the most sets up the vibration that allows your life to fall, literally, into place; through coincidence, through the seeming strangest of events, and, once in a while, to keep it interesting, through the obvious course of events as well.

You Already Do This

You already do this in various forms. You already reaffirm and reassert some intentions. Very often, you constantly repeat: “I cannot do the thing that excites me; I cannot achieve the thing that excites me.” This also establishes a vision and intention but not according to preference. Nevertheless, it is the same thing as an intention because it is a statement by you.

The universe is quite neutral. It does not read into what you are saying and interpret. It takes you quite literally. When you repeat these disempowered statements, you affirm and are actually clarifying a vision that lays down the foundation for a reality in which you are not able to do what excites you. It also brings with it the proof that, yes, you cannot do what excites you. That is what you are continually stating as your belief and setting up as your foundation, along with the corresponding emotions, thoughts, and actions.

In other words, you already use vision and intention; it's just that it is generally creating a random result. You don't need to cease being random, nor do you need to run away from the random approach. Instead, when you consciously establish your clear intention, you automatically distance yourself from the old approach. It's not by running from it in an invalidating way but instead by validating it and acting according to the new approach. In this way, you automatically distance yourself from the negative of what you say you prefer.

Act on What Is Available

I remind you again that once you establish your overall vision and intention, you will either be able to do something and act in this moment toward that particular end or not. If you can, by all means, act and do whatever is most obvious. It is there for a reason and will stand out in your reality for a reason.

Once you have established a clear intention, you don't have to fixate on it if it is not available in the moment. You can simply check in: "Is it available? Is there anything that I can do right now toward my vision? Yes? Then I'll do it. No? Alright. What can I do something about?" Remind yourself and maintain that clarified vision, yet move forward from what is available.

In any given moment, you don't need to use the most exciting thing as an excuse not to do the things that are exciting in that moment. You can simply use it as a tool of alignment to remind yourself, "This is what I will settle for, no less than in my life; this excites me; this is obviously one of the reasons, key reasons, I am here; therefore, I will allow it to unfold into my reality. And I will allow it to be an ecstatic process by continuing to maintain it as a clear vision while acting from what is available on the things that excite me."

Now, that is an exciting and ecstatic life.

This approach replaces your old momentum, the illusion of momentum, with a seemingly new preferable momentum. Although momentum is an illusion overall, it can also be used to your advantage. You seemingly establish the momentum of your excitement with integrity.

Conclusion

You are on the cusp of a whole new understanding of your society. Many things are occurring and will continue to occur, and many exciting ideas are just around the corner. It is our joy that, on some level, you invited us to participate with you, although it is only on the sidelines for now. It is your game, you make the rules, and you get to determine the outcome.

We are all truly related to each other. In the essence sense, we are, very literally, brothers, sisters, cousins, parents, and children in many ways yet in many differing and different styles of relationships.

Define Yourself and Accept Your Deservability

This is part 2 of a 3-part intensive. We created the intensive in three parts so that we can cover, in a slightly more advanced fashion, the basics of creating your reality consciously.

In the last chapter, we discussed your vision and clear intention. Your intention locks in your reality and allows you to have a say and to decide, using whatever criteria that you want, what will occur in your reality.

When you take into consideration your preference, you align your vision with your passion and excitement. To some degree, we have discussed this and led an exercise to allow you to get in touch with what it is that truly excites you. Now that you have crystallized and created your vision, we will expand on this idea and explain certain aspects so that you can use what you have already created in your reality to a positive advantage and transform whatever you don't prefer into a preferred manifestation.

Definitions

First, we will discuss the concept of definitions. Your definitions, literally, are how you define your reality. They are your blueprint. Another way of saying this is that definitions are what you believe about your reality. Definitions are your belief system. The definitions that you assign to your reality are part and parcel of the beliefs about that reality.

Definitions Contrary to Your Vision

You may have definitions about yourself that run contrary to your vision. One of the advantages of having a vision is that it will allow you to see these more easily and, therefore, transform more easily and quickly.

We mention this also because sometimes people will feel that their vision or desire is contrary to who they are. They feel that desire causes suffering. That is one way to look at it. Instead, a desire and vision can be one of your greatest and quickest ways to align and ascend.

Once you have established and clarified your vision, certain definitions that you still hold and which run contrary to the positive of that vision will come up. If you allow them to come up and deliver the message that they have for you, you will see that you can very quickly transform them.

Step one is to allow them to come up. We have discussed allowance. Allowance is the mechanism of true creator-hood. It is the way that you already create your reality. The first step to re-defining those definitions is to allow them to come up as they will, including the ones that run contrary to the fulfillment of your vision, and acknowledge them. Be honest with yourself.

Remember that when you believe something, you then feel that way, you then think that way, and you then act that way. Ultimately, it is those actions that then create physically into your life the manifestation that you prefer.

Make a List of Definitions You Prefer

In whatever way you find is easiest for you, whether it is through dialogue with yourself, mediation, using pencil and paper, or in any other way that you find that you organize your thoughts, think about your vision and make a note of what definitions a person who is already doing that thing would have.

When you do this, you will see the definitions necessary to begin to manifest your clear vision following the path of least resistance. Through the process of elimination, as you make a list of the definitions, you will find which definitions you need to have to make your vision a reality and which run contrary to your vision. This is an opportunity to allow all the definitions to come up.

The more you can define and lock in your vision, the more you will know what definitions someone who has already accomplished that vision would have and how to more easily reorient yourself toward that vision.

We hope this is clear. If not, please take a moment to review it.

Again, in whatever way you find most efficient, whether you write it, whether it is merely a dialogue, or whether it is through your meditative state, make the time to establish what definitions a person who is already doing the thing you say you wish to do holds.

Acknowledge Your Contrary Definitions

Again, allowing any definitions that you already express that run contrary to that particular definition to come out, acknowledge it. Allow yourself to see, as you acknowledge it, that it has had you feeling a certain way, has had you thinking a certain way, and, ultimately, has had you acting a certain way. Those actions are the actions in your life that still run contrary to what you say you prefer.

How Would This Feel?

When you establish the new definitions that the preferred you would have, you can also extrapolate in your imagination: “How would a person already believing this feel?” and feel that. Allow yourself to physically feel it before then moving on to the step of establishing how a person who already believes that would think.

Once you allow yourself to feel that belief, the thoughts of a person with that belief will come quite clearly, quite quickly, and then allow yourself to see the actions that that you would perform.

Use the Referential Preferential You

Perhaps it will be obvious to some of you that, to some degree, we have already discussed a tool, a methodology, through which much of what we are discussing is simply automatic, and that is the “Referential Preferential You.” When you create the preferred you in your imagination and hand situations over to that you, that you has the definitions that you would prefer and that reinforce the clear vision.

Going about it through the Referential Preferential You is one very powerful, very accessible way to get in touch with your definitions and transform them into definitions that you already prefer.

Even the listing of the definitions that your vision requires simply speeds along the process. You can go about it either way. You can do both. The Referential Preferential You, again, is a tool that is part and parcel of you. You can never lose that tool. That tool will always provide the definitions that are most conducive to doing anything that you wish.

Persistence

If your reality appears to run contrary to your clear vision, I again remind you that a person who believes in their clear vision would contain the definition that you call persistence. Persistence is simply a matter of understanding that you intend to create this reality, and simply nothing in the external world can stop that intention.

Perhaps, it may not go according to the timing, or perhaps it will, but if it does not, your unwillingness to give up on the idea means you can never fail. If your reality appears contrary to what it is that you say you desire, maintain that clear vision and drum up, or allow to come to the surface, any definitions that would suggest otherwise.

Pay Attention to Your Definitions

Your definitions either reinforce your clear vision or, at times, they may seem to be at odds with it. If those definitions are not the most conducive definitions for that vision, your life will let you know. If you always remember that you can trace back to your definitions, through how you feel, through how you think, and through how you act, your life will always be your barometer.

Either you can catch it as an emotion that you do not prefer, or if you find yourself filled to some degree seemingly automatically performing non-preferred actions, which we will discuss in more detail, understand that those actions in and of themselves also can be used to trace back to the most expressed definition in that moment.

You truly act as though you are the person who believes whatever it is you believe. You can use your emotions, your thoughts, and your actions to define what you must be believing in that moment.

You Can't Get Rid of Beliefs

Allow me to draw a distinction that, again, we discussed in a previous chapter. When you say, "I believe this, and I do not believe, perhaps, its opposite," understand you contain both beliefs; otherwise, you would not be able to draw the distinction. Any belief that you do not prefer and do not wish to express, your ability to even think of it means you contain it.

Which Belief Are You Expressing?

It is not a matter of getting rid of this belief and having that belief; you have all beliefs. It is a matter of which belief you are expressing in your life. Everything that you believe, and everything that you do not say you believe, still exists within you. I remind you, there is no outside.

You contain all beliefs. The ones that are having an effect on your life in any given moment are the beliefs that you are expressing from all of the beliefs that exist within you. So, if you say, "Well, I must believe this," I remind you, you also contain the opposite belief.

It is merely a matter of which belief you choose to express, and I again remind you that you express your beliefs through your emotions, thoughts, and actions. Remembering this truly gives you back your power. You contain all definitions. It is not a matter of getting rid of the ones you do not prefer but choosing and expressing the ones you do while not invalidating the beliefs you do not prefer.

Whenever you create anything in your life, you are expressing a belief, but in every given moment, you also contain that opposite belief. I tell you this to allow you to see the degree of your complete power and to which you contain it all. It is simply a matter of which beliefs you express as to which ones will have a result or an effect on your life.

Allow and Validate Negative Definitions

Allow yourself to come to terms with what definitions would behoove your vision and allow your life to deliver any definition that is not in alignment with that vision. Embrace it. Embrace yourself for delivering the non-preferred definition. Do not berate or judge yourself. You are handing yourself back your power, not showing yourself your shortcomings unless you label them that way. Therefore, you can get either effect.

If you understand that your reality is handing you back the keys to drive the vehicle of your life in a preferred direction, you can rejoice when something negative comes up, not because you embrace the negative aspect of it, nor because you condone it, but because now is it back in your power to redefine. Any definition you are achieving a result from is simply the definition you are expressing.

Now that you know this, it is up to you to exercise your ability to respond, your “response-ability,” with the preferred definition or not. Should an unpreferred definition come up, embrace it and allow yourself to use its timing of presenting itself to you to be your perfect timing to replace it and express the new preferred definition or belief.

That’s your reality on a silver platter. It will hand you any definition that is no longer representative of who you choose to be. If you run and sulk, it will simply seem to show up as obstacles in your path. You can apply this process to it to transform your reality:

1. Embrace it
2. Allow yourself to feel it
3. Glean the definition
4. Choose a new definition
5. Allow yourself to feel that
6. Allow yourself to see how you would think with the new definition
7. Allow yourself to see how you would act with the new definition
8. Act as a person with the new definition would act.

This is the same mechanism you have already used for your entire life and how you have created it. There are no new skills to bone up on. Allow your reality to transform by allowing it to present you with the definitions that no longer serve you.

Deservability

Another ability that you all have and even have labeled it that way in your language is “deservability.” This is not something that you need to go get. This is a definition within you that I challenge you to express. You have the ability to understand that you deserve to create the reality that you prefer, particularly if that reality is within integrity, for then it will not harm anyone nor you, and everyone is served.

You exist. This is one of your primary qualities, merely that you exist. That brings along with it the automatic ability to know that you must, obviously, deserve to exist. Otherwise, how did you get here? Did you slip in a crack of creation? No, you expressed the definition of the fact that you deserve to exist by taking the action of incarnating as this life.

Because you are an expression of “all that is,” “all that is,” which is not truly separate from you, but you sometimes view it this way, always bequeaths that you deserve to exist. The only one who ever entertained the opposite definition is each and every one of you.

Because you contain all beliefs, it is not accurate to say, “I only contain the belief that I do not deserve anything,” and it is not accurate to say, “I only contain the belief that I do deserve everything.” You contain both beliefs. You have the choice of which one to express. You can allow your reality through the feedback of your actions, thoughts, and emotions to allow you to know in any given moment if you are expressing what you deserve or if you are expressing what you do not deserve. Either way, you are expressing one or the other.

You Are the Only One Who Judges You

There is no outside that judges you. “All that is” is 100% non-faillingly unconditionally loving. You simply cannot screw up in the eyes of “all that is.” Everything goes. That is what unconditional love means. Therefore, the only one who can assign that you do not deserve anything is you.

You may say, “Well, others in my society seem to very willingly define that I do not deserve this or that,” but understand, when someone says that to you, if you do not believe it, it simply is an empty statement with no effect. If you feel an effect from it, that is not them influencing you; that is them providing a reflection that, somewhere within you, you still match that vibration. You can only feel your matching of the vibration. In that moment, you still contain the belief that you deserve it all; it's just that you are simply expressing the belief that you do not.

Deservability Is a Given

“Deservability,” your ability to deserve, is simply a given. You can express or revoke that particular designation. It's up to you. No one else and nothing else can. If you are expressing, “I deserve to exist, I deserve to create a life of ecstasy with integrity,” then anything that anyone says to you will simply be, “Thank you, but no thank you. I appreciate what you are saying. I will take it under advisement. If I feel that changes need to be made, I thank you. If not, I still thank you. You have reflected to me flawlessly.”

This is not patronizing if you are sincere. Thanking the messenger is an integrated alternative to shooting the messenger. And I mean this in any way that it will come, any definition that is delivered to you in your life. You can blame the definition, shoot the messenger, or you can understand that the messenger has served a purpose. Embrace the messenger. Perhaps you can catch the messenger off-guard. This is what happens when you choose to express integration.

You Will See the Deservability of Others

When you begin to express integration, you will not only understand that your ability to deserve is up to you to express, but you will also see that deservability in others. It may even be in others that you had heretofore judged. They, too, have the right and reason. “All that is” obviously thinks so. “All that is” loves them unconditionally. You can begin to exercise that same unconditionality. You can begin to “recognize the divinity,” it is an expression, so I will therefore use it, in each individual. With that divinity comes unconditional love, comes deservability, and comes a set of expressed definitions.

Use Your Reality as Evidence

You can always use anything that is offered to you in any form in a positive way. Often you assume that there are a few things in your reality that you simply cannot apply a positive label to. Understand that everything, everything is synchronicity, and if you say you are willing to assign a positive meaning, sometimes your reality will see if you are really serious about that and give you many opportunities to assign positive meaning. This may seem like an obnoxious inconvenience, but it is one of your greatest opportunities for accelerated growth.

You Are Learning to Express Your Power

I revel in communicating with a roomful of third-transitional-fourth-density beings, in other words, people who are seeing and appreciating their non-physical perspective as conscious creators. What will express more of the fourth density perspective, the more unlimited physical perspective, is to establish your vision, clarify your definition, be clear about expressing your ability to deserve, and, ultimately, clear action. That is all. We will talk about action more later.

When you feel you are in the third density, which is a limited physical reality, you still contain the definition of fourth, which is an unlimited physical reality. We are simply expressing a limited point of view. You are so limitless that you can impose extreme limitations on yourself. I understand that this seems like a paradox and an irony, but that's only possible because you have such great power and, in fact, are the great power.

You express that power in each and every given moment of your life. So great is that power that you even have the ability to forget completely that it is your power and assign that power one piece at a time to persons, places, and things within your reality. That is merely one definition.

"It is happening to me," is a definition you all contain, but "It is happening from me" is also a definition that you all contain and are beginning to express more and more. Once you constantly express that, that will be all you know, experientially, and you will be fourth density, literally, right here, right now.

Grant Yourself Deservability

Simply continue to grant yourself deservability. You have struggled hard enough, long enough. Even if you buy into the dues-paying mentality, you are paid up. Therefore, you don't need to use that definition to hold yourself back any longer. Everything is due now.

Hello

Now is the only time you ever exist. Now is the time you can transform. I remind you to be mindful of what you are expressing without invalidating it.

Conclusion

Thank you for your willingness to continue to entertain communications from our stream and to entertain us as well. You are all, as you say in your colloquial slang, "a riot." We are a light race. We are a happy race, and you have brought us great joy. We thank you for it as a gift that means the universe to us. In return for your willingness to function as my equal, I thank you. I express my unconditional love.

How to Use Action

We have discussed many topics in this book so far, and we have enjoyed sharing this body of information with you. In many ways, the foundation is, fundamentally speaking, complete. Now, it's time to apply it.

As we have said before, we do not insist in any way, shape, or form that you do what we say. It's not better than anything else that you are doing. It's just different. It's an alternative. It's an option that will allow you, if you desire, and if you feel that you deserve it, to create a life that you enjoy, that you prefer. It allows you, in no uncertain terms, to completely validate yourself, and through that process, validate your reality, and by extension, validate all the other individuals that seem to exist or cohabitate with you within your reality.

This chapter is part three of a three-part series. Part one was about clarifying your vision to shed some light on who it is that you desire to be and who it is you are. In clarifying that idea, you set up a vibration, and that vibration then becomes your reality by maintaining it as a clear intention and acting that way.

Part two was the mechanism that allows for the recording of that vibration: clear definition, clear deserve-ability, and clear desire. These lay down the fundamental foundation whereby all of the aspects are in place, and then, all you need to do to complete the process as a conscious creator is to act with that foundation.

Action

To apply these ideas in your reality, you must act. Your soul is expressing a particular aspect of itself as the physical being you are. Innately, you are infinite creators and have an infinite consciousness, but you are exploring a finite point of view in a physical reality.

The ultimate expression of your creator-hood in a physical reality is action. Action moves. It is the moving mechanism of your reality. The beliefs, the emotions, and the thoughts are a foundation. That foundation suddenly or blatantly affects your actions, and it is your actions that create the reality.

Action Is a Form of Spirituality

Your society has many different ideas about spirituality and what you generally refer to as mundane material reality. Often, we see people striving to express their spiritual side and yet feel that in order to do so that they must deny their physical side. This, to us, is a paradox.

This is one way to go about focusing on your spirituality, but from our perspective, it is generally at the cost of a portion of your spirituality. Here is why. Your actions and your material reality are a spiritual expression. They are not separate. Action and materiality are spiritual and are forms of spirituality. Action is an expression of your soul and your spirit. You don't need to deny material existence or deny taking action to be spiritual.

Acknowledge the inherent spirituality within your actions and material world. Everything in creation is equal. Spirituality is not better than materiality. No. One is an expression of the other. You can consciously express yourself through action and manipulate the materials of your reality with a spiritual attitude. It is not one at the cost of the other. In order to create in this reality, you must perform an action; you must do something.

Keep Your Feet on the Ground

Another analogy that we like to use is that it is all well and good to have your head in the clouds, to think lofty thoughts, to ponder your spirituality, but it only becomes practical, applicable, and usable when while your head is in the clouds to keep your feet on the ground. When we speak about grounding yourself, we mean to do what you can do in any given moment from what is available, not what is not available.

Your Actions Reflect Your Beliefs

No matter what, your actions ultimately create your reality. You can always use your actions to tell and trace back what you must be thinking, feeling, and believing. You always act like you believe something. If you say and mean, “My belief is that I deserve everything that I can create in positive love and light,” then believe me, you will act that way. If you say, “I do not deserve,” then you will act like a person who does not deserve.

Remember, technically speaking, you contain both beliefs: “I deserve” and “I do not deserve.” You contain both of those beliefs. You are an expression of “all that is.” There is no outside. You contain it all. It is not “I have this belief, and I do not have this other belief.” You have both beliefs, but you are expressing one belief instead of the other. That expression takes the form of action. Action is what expresses your decision.

You are either acting, using the aforementioned example, like a person who deserves, or acting like a person who does not. There is no middle ground. It’s one or the other. If you act like a person who does not deserve, you get the evidence. Those actions have results, which are the evidence of that belief.

If you allow yourself to see and project how a person who does deserve would act and act that way instead, without denying that you have the unpreferred belief but choosing the preferred belief, you can transform your life. Your actions create your life in a physical universe.

Act According to Preference

Acting according to preference is the bottom line. If you say, “Well, I can’t do that,” you are still taking an action. You are continuing to perform the old unpreferred action.

It is not automatic. It is not something that happens to you. You are choosing to continue the things you do not prefer. You contain all beliefs, and what determines the result is which one you express through your actions.

Actions are the bottom line. Action, in this particular physical universe, and there are many other universes in which this is not so much the emphasis, is the bottom line. It is the primary mover of your reality.

Pay Attention to How You’re Acting

Pay attention to your actions and ask yourself if something non-preferred seems to be coming out of the neutral soup, “What am I doing right now? How am I acting? Am I acting according to my preferred belief, or am I acting according to my non-preferred belief? I am definitely doing one or the other.” The first step is to acknowledge and be honest with yourself about what you are already doing. If you do not own it, you then create an elaborate explanation of how it is happening to you: “It is a habit. Oh! A habit is automatic. I can’t help it. It is happening to me.”

Well, yes, a habit seems to be something that occurs automatically, without thought, but once you think about it, once you define it as a habit, you are now conscious of it. From that point forward, it is no longer a habit, even if you continue to do it. It is a choice. It is up to you. You are always acting one way or another. Always.

If you are getting non-preferred results in your life, look at your actions. Do not assume that doing the same thing over and over again seemingly will yield you a different result. No. What will yield a different result is a new action. What gives you a blueprint for the new action is your preferred beliefs, emotions, and thoughts. Factor them in and act according to preference.

Act on the Options Available

Act according to unconditional love. Act according to your excitement in every given moment. There are generally in your finite creations just so many things that are available.

“Can I do something about this right now? No. That is not available. Can I do something about this right now? Yes. That is one of the options available in the moment.”

Remain grounded and pay attention to what’s available. If you begin to act and choose from what is available, you will begin to see a very, very extreme change in your life. That is coming from a belief and assumption that “I always have exactly what I need in any given moment, though perhaps, now and then, I may have to search out for it; it may not seem that obvious.”

You can apply your creativity to seek and begin to examine more closely what is available, “Well, is that available in the moment? No. Is it something I wish to do? Is it available? No, then it is not an option. I cannot ‘act’ on that thing. I would still like to do that thing; therefore, I maintain it as a clear intention, and when it is one of the options, I know that that timing will be perfect, and when I can act on it, I will. That's all I need to know. I still intend to do this, even though the reality is not presenting it at this time, and when it comes along, I will act on it."

You Can Have Anything You Desire

Your reality delivers to you, on a silver platter, anything that you desire. At the same time, that does not mean the things you want are going to drop on your head like a safe. Your reality provides situations and opportunities that, if you can act on and continue the flow of the momentum, you can have those things. You can create the methodology and the mechanism that will attract anything you desire. It is completely up to you.

The moment you let go of your clear intention, you've "sold out" so to speak. That is the only time you cannot achieve your clear intention—when you let it go and allow the reality to talk you out of it.

Excitement Leads Your Intention

Suppose you maintain your clear intention and act on what is available that leads you to that clear intention, whether it is obvious or not. Because it also excites you, anything that excites you in the moment has to do with any other thing that excites you, even if, reality-wise, it seems to have nothing to do with it.

They are like stepping stones. One stone seems to have nothing to do with one on the other end, but you must traverse one at a time in order to get to the other end, which makes each stone an integral part of the journey. Whatever excites you in any given moment from what is available in any given moment is the path of least resistance to the overall thing that you intend to do and that excites you, whether it is apparent or not.

Lamenting Gets You Nowhere

If you sit around, spending the time, lamenting that it is not available, then your action is a lamentation rather than continuing the flow of allowing your reality to flawlessly deliver to you opportunity after opportunity, advantage after advantage, coincidence after coincidence. Coincidence does not mean accidental; it means the many interwoven series of events that seem completely unrelated but that are happening at the same time. “Co” the same, “incidence” same time.

Now Is the Time to Act

You are all on the threshold of the greatest transformation that you have individually and collectively ever witnessed in your soul’s life on this planet. The timing is key. The timing is essential. Now is the time to do. Now is the time to move.

When you allow yourself to do so, you will shine. You will brilliantly shine as a beacon. You will attract around you a nucleus of new individuals, and this will be the beginning of fourth-density mankind.

But this won't happen with just talk. The time for talking is over, or at least the time for only talking is over. The time for words is over. The time for action is now, and the essentialness of the timing will become apparent to you as you watch the fate of your world begin to alter.

The World Is Transforming Positively

Do not allow anything you see to provide an excuse to create a negative transformation. Things may seem to be shaking up in a negative way, but I have also shared with you many times that as you expand, your awareness of positivity and negativity increases. Your experience of negativity, should you decide to follow your excitement, will be nil, but your awareness of it, for now, will be pervasive.

Whatever you allow yourself to use as evidence will be up to you, but I simply say that no matter what, no matter what is on your news, is on your media, or is in your world scenario, a positive transformation is in full swing.

Certain individuals will choose to express a portion of that transformation in negative terms; I need not tell you this; it is evident on your planet. But your experience of it, and your creation of an alternative bubble reality, is one of the factors that will allow what you perceive to be your whole planet to transform in a positive way.

Each One of You Makes a Difference

Now, more than ever, each and every one of you makes a difference. Every one of you. The whole is profoundly, profoundly affected by each and every one of you. When you say, “Well, what can I possibly do about that,” you then perform an action of a person who could not possibly do anything about it. And so, then the results of those actions show you the evidence. “See! I couldn’t have helped it anyway!” But this is natural. All beliefs have self-sustaining, self-perpetuating systems of logic and systems of evidence.

When you decide, “I also contain the belief that I can do something about it, and I see if I am expressing that belief, I would act this way,” and allow your imagination to provide how a person would act in that regard.

Change Actions Change Results

Choosing the preferred actions changes the entire reality. Performing the same actions or seemingly similar actions yields seemingly similar results. The one time you enter a seemingly similar situation and do something different, you understand in no uncertain terms through the result that it is a completely different situation, and the only thing that kept it seemingly the same was your similar continual treatment of it.

Now Is the Time for Conscious Action

Now is the time for action. Now is the time for the application. You will be acting according to some belief. You always have. You are right now as you read this and will continue to.

What I am sharing, what I am suggesting, is that you become conscious about what you are doing. Nothing is automatic. The moment you are conscious of anything, it is no longer something lingering in a subconscious; it is something conscious that you now choose to do something about. Choosing to do nothing about it is one action, and it yields one result.

When you choose not to settle for anything less and act on your excitement with integrity, you express your life in the most effortless way possible, with the most fruitful results, representative of who you choose to be. After you establish your vision, establishing your excitement is only part of the process of recognition. Where that process becomes grounded and connects to your life, to your reality, to your daily life is what you do with all this.

Use the Referential Preferential You

I once again ask you to be cognizant of what you are doing, and if there is something that you are doing that you do not prefer, remember you can do something else. One of the strongest tools we have shared with you is an imagination template of the preferred you. The “referential preferential you” is the name that we have assigned. This is the you that is already the way that you prefer in your imagination.

The reason for that tool is to provide a set of actions to say, “Alright. I’m about to enter a situation. before I do anything, allow me to see how the preferred me would act in the hypothetical situation in my imagination.” Allow the preferred you in your imagination to provide an alternate set of actions. It always will. If you access it, it always will.

Of the tools that we have shared, one of the most potent is the referential preferential you, for it always in any given moment, with not needing to consult one other individual, has what the preferred you would do, would act like, the actions that the preferred you would take in any given moment. That is a tool of self-empowerment. That is a tool you do not need me or anyone else to use. It is yours. It is permanent. Call forth the referential preferential you.

Act on the Most Exciting Option Available

Call forth the excitement from within your heart, and act on that excitement with the recognition that everything is one integrated reality, that everything is an extension of you, not apart from you, and therefore, deserves the respect you demand. That is an expression of integrity. Act on your excitement with integrity.

If you were to now forget everything we have ever shared, simply from this point forward, were you to allow yourself to see what is available in any given moment, choose with your excitement and act on that option with integrity. All that we have shared and that you have just forgotten will simply become obvious and evident. It is all an expression of following the message that your higher self always broadcasts to your physical self: your excitement. That is who you are, and acting on it with integrity will allow everything else to be obvious and all questions to be answered.

Challenge: Act According to Preference

Once you apply these processes, should you find, and many of you will, that questions come up, that is the level on which we can function with you and offer the next level of support, but only if you act. I am issuing you a healthy challenge to rise and act according to preference. Most or all of your questions will be answered. The ones that do come up are now what we are willing to discuss. You will find a fascination that perhaps you have not imagined in this process.

Conclusion

Allow me to, once again and for the first time, thank you all and again express my unconditional love and appreciation for your willingness to function through your inquisitive nature and to accept other realities. I don't insist that you believe that I am who I say I am. I understand that many of you do, and only because you feel that that is correct for you. As I have said, I cannot now and would not, even if I were able physically, prove my existence to you at this time. Applying what we have been sharing will be your proof.

It works 100%. That is the guarantee that I can give you. If you do it, if you act according to your excitement with integrity, you will create a life of ecstasy. You will create a seeming momentum, an ecstatic explosion of coincidence, and recognition of the synchronicity of all things. That I guarantee you. Being that you, you are literally changing the vibration of who you are, as a spirit, as a soul, as an expression in your physical world.

This is the vibratory level that we physically exist on. So, this opens up the possibility of face-to-face physical interactions. I have always shared that we do not insist that this occur. But there is a degree of likelihood behind it occurring, and what will accelerate it is not talking but doing and “walking your talk.” That will literally raise your vibration, expand your consciousness, and allow us to perceive each other in a more physical way.

That is all there is to it. I do not dangle this as a carrot or even a goal, but to share the joy in becoming more of who you are and share the joy in you. We always have only considered you equal to us, and we enjoy you beginning to treat yourself with that same respect.

I thank you for your willingness to open up the doors within you and begin to peer behind them. There is nothing that you can create that will overcome you, and the timing of your creations is perfect. Even if you have never done what your creation is now presenting to you, the fact that it is presenting it to you, and in the timing that it is presenting it to you, is your indication that you can handle it. Interpreting it this way and then performing the corresponding actions will give you the result, the manifestation of what I am saying, not theory.

Be Yourself

Be yourself. When you interact with us, you give us a gift. You help us understand you and your society better. You help us grow and expand.

We have said and will continue to say many times that each individual 100% entirely creates their entire reality, every single aspect of it. From your perspective, this even includes creating me interacting and reflecting back to you in your reality.

There is a paradox here, and it is that this is true for every individual. This is one of the infinite aspects of reality. Although you may wonder, “How is this possible? How does everyone actually create it all?” The bottom line is this is how it functions.

You Are a Gift to Others

These types of concepts that seem to be mutually exclusive actually coexist, and this is part of the definition of infinity. All possibilities are already true. It becomes a matter of you, as a filter consciousness, deciding which aspects of infinity, which of both sides of everything, you will choose to perceive, express, and experience. Truly, the greatest gift that you have to offer is being the truest version of yourself that you can possibly be.

You Are Only This You, Once

Although you are foundationally and fundamentally multidimensional, infinite, and eternal beings, as far as the way you are expressing yourself in this life, this is the only time you will be the you that you are now, the very specific version of the you that you are now.

When you understand that as an infinite being, you are choosing to have a finite experience, and you will only have this version of the experience once, you will see that being the best version of you that you can be is the most conscious and direct benefit that you can contribute to your own life, to your own perception, and to your reality.

Expressing Yourself Is Your Greatest Gift

When you define who you are and express who you are consciously and fully, you are the greatest gift to not only yourself but all those that you seem to interact with. Within society, you will often accept cues from your perception of the mass perception of you, buy into that idea, and actually express a version of yourself that is what everyone else wishes to see, at least your understanding of what you think everyone else wishes you to be. You are not necessarily fully expressing yourself according to the you that you know yourself to be.

Only You Know Who You Are

Allow me to say in no uncertain terms: Only you truly know who you are. Anyone can merely have a version of you that serves them for their exploration. Their version is no truer than your own version of yourself unless you believe their version and begin to decide that perhaps their version is true, and then you express yourself in that way. The point here is that you always have the opportunity and the 100% ability to simply express yourself as you know yourself to be.

You Have a 100% Unique Perspective

This is a great gift because each and every one of you is a 100% unique perspective not existing anywhere else in the multiverse in exactly the way that you express yourself. The more you are willing to express your uniqueness as you know it to be, the more you are consciously contributing by providing a clear reflection of who you are for other individuals to do with what they will, which you have no control over. How anyone else interprets you will always be up to them, as well as it is up to you to interpret your own self.

When you create your life by deciding who you are, trusting that decision, and then acting as though you trust that decision and you do it fully, the result is you express yourself most fully. This gives anyone who would attract you in your reality the opportunity to take what you have to offer and use it in whatever creative way they will.

Not Being Yourself Deprives Others

If you are interacting with another individual and you are withholding who you are to some degree because you believe they have an expectation about who you are, and therefore, when you interact with them, you allow them to see what you think they want to see, you are actually allowing them to have an elaborate conversation with themselves rather than with the unique perspective you have to offer. Of course, as there is in everything, there is value in this, but it does not give the other individual an opportunity to grow in the unique way they would, were they exposed to you being yourself fully.

Trust your own preferred interpretation of who you are and realize that you are not truly doing anyone a big favor by saying what they wish to hear and, in fact, are depriving them of your unique viewpoint.

When you attract yourself to an interaction with another individual, from their end, they have attracted you, and one might, in that sense, assume that they have attracted you for the unique perspective you offer. If you are willing to give them that perspective and trust that you feel the way you feel for a valid reason, then whether or not they agree with the perspective or not, they are given an opportunity to grow by having a comparison of another way to be and another option of how one can express themselves. When you tell them what they wish to hear, which is not truly a representation of who you are, you deprive them of this gift that you are.

Being Yourself Makes Your Life Better

When you trust who you are and express yourself, trust what you attract yourself to, and fully be yourself in any given situation, you become a clear reflection of who you are. Paradoxically, because you are allowing those desires and preferences to be constantly expressed, you are allowing your reality to build itself around you more accurately. You are not confusing the expectations others have of you that, in many ways, sell yourself short of who you actually know yourself to be.

Being Yourself Is the Easiest Path

Being yourself, though some individuals may interpret this as being a “complicated procedure,” is actually the easiest procedure there is in expressing yourself. It is effortless to do what you know to be true, and it actually takes a bit of effort, concentration, and attention to detail to say the things that others wish to hear and maintain the consistency of really having that point of view. That’s tiring.

You don’t need to force yourself to be who you are. In fact, if you wish to get technical, if anything, when you are saying what you think someone else wants to hear, you are forcing yourself to be what you think they want to see and compromising who you are. When it comes to being yourself, however, there is no forcing involved. In fact, it is the opposite of “forcing” or “manipulating.” You allow, let go, and be yourself. You allow yourself to be who you are.

Being Yourself Will Surprise You

In many situations, you might assume that if you gave your true opinion, a person would act in a particular way, and so, therefore, you didn't give it. On the other hand, if you boldly and consistently be yourself fully, you will be surprised how often their response is not what you expected. Even if, in the short-term, the response is what you expect, you will, generally speaking, find that, down the line, they are appreciative of you for giving them a counterpoint of view because that gave them another option.

If you say what they wish to hear, they don't need you; instead, they can sit in the mirror and have that conversation without you. Having your unique presence and perspective available is the gift that you have to offer.

Give Freely Without Insisting Acceptance

As an analogy or metaphor, when you give away the gift of who you are and then allow the individual receiving the gift to do whatever it is they wish, including return the gift, you allow them to do what they want with who you are. You don't force yourself on someone else in order to simply express who you are. Allow them to do what they will with it, which they will anyway.

Being Yourself Will Give You Relief

When you get a feel for what I am saying and realize that it is all right to be who you are consciously and fully, you will generally feel a great sense of relief because “acting” as others would have you be really takes quite a bit of vigilance and effort, plus it takes a lot of attention to detail to maintain the opinion that you think they wish to see.

As a side note, often, what you think they want to hear is not really what they want to hear anyway. That is a mental game that you play with yourself. You may say what you think others want to hear. Sometimes they may, and other times they may not. However, when you are willing to be who you are fully, you will always contribute in a positive way to any situation.

Being Yourself Will Improve Situations

When you do, as I have said, you become a more powerful clarified expression of who you are, and this makes the things, the people, the interactions, and the relationships that would need that type of a person the most, most able to see you. When you express yourself clearly, you can more clearly attract the things that will support that version of yourself. When you are yourself, there are many fringe benefits.

Only you know who you are. In your heart of hearts, you can always tell in any given situation, no matter how you feel, that you have the best grasp of who you are. You can allow yourself to express this consciously and fully. You can allow the benefits of your unique perspective to spread through the interactions, relationships, and situations in your life.

Offering Your Perspective Gives Options

I remind you, when we say we get something out of this interaction, we mean it. While we do get a chance to define ourselves better, we also get your unique perspective and how you would approach it. Your approach is often different than what we would do. Plus, we often like your approach better than what we are doing. In other words, you give us more options.

This also works between you and others in your society. You have a lot to offer one another. You are fundamentally a positive being. You are able to produce your life. You are able to interact with those you want to. If you dive into who you are with that understanding and express what it is that you have to express in your life, this changes the flavor and way you present yourself. When you do this, life feels “natural.” “Normal” is not the most accurate word because it is a judgment. The word “natural” reflects you being your own version of yourself.

When we interact with you, please be yourself most fully. We then receive the greatest opportunity to see the specific gifts that you have to offer. And when you do the same with other people, you will be surprised and enjoy the results. Being who you are adds more to any situation than being the person you perceive that others think you are.

Think about it for a while. Unless, of course, you're the type of person that doesn't care, in which case, move on.

You Decide Who You Are

In that light and tying this all together, remember that in every given moment, you are always deciding who you are: "I am this person." You then proceed as that person, and your actions express and reflect being that person unless you change your decision, and then everything shifts to the new decision.

If you have defined yourself consciously and created the referential preferential you, then life will be much clearer. You will attract exactly the things you need to continue to be that whole version of yourself.

On the other hand, if you squelch yourself regularly, you will attract situations that make it easy to squelch yourself. In that case, life may appear frustrating and paradoxically non-supportive.

All it takes to shift out of this is to clearly express who you are. You do that by determining who you prefer to be and deciding, "Alright. I'm going to decide I'm somebody. I know that. In fact, even if I'm not conscious about it, I'm going to do it. I'm somebody anyway. Why not get in touch with who I want to be and who I ideally see myself as and have that be the decision about who I am?"

When you decide who you are, if you decide that you are a unique being, maintain that decision, and your actions reflect that, your physical reality shifts to support that new, fuller no-holds-barred version of who you are. The face, the image, the look of your reality become supportive, abundant, and reinforcing, not squelching nor frustrating.

Use Your Power Consciously

The key is to use the very same mechanism that you already use to create your life but to use it consciously. If you maintain your focus on who you ideally know yourself to be consciously, flawlessly, seamlessly, and in an uninterrupted manner, then reality will build itself around you to reflect that. This is exactly the same mechanism that has given you the current face of your life.

If there are things in your life that you do not prefer, it is because you are making a decision as the unpreferred you and trying to be who everyone else says you must be: "So I must be." You only get the effect of being a certain person when you agree with their opinion of you.

Ultimately, it always boils back down to your own decision in this moment. "I am this person." This is where your power lies. You do this anyway, and it is automatic and effortless.

When you decide how you will label yourself consciously, you now use the very same mechanism you have used flawlessly in your entire existence in a constructive, conscious, supportive, productive, and preferential manner. There's nothing new here; however, it can make everything in your life appear new across the board when you are consistent about it.

Circumstances Don't Decide

People often use the opinions and expectations of others to decide and define who they are. In addition, you often use circumstances as evidence to shift your decision. If you decide, "I am this person. This is my ideal self," and evidence comes along which is neutral, but you assign it the meaning that it is contradictory to your decision of who you are, and then change your decision and say, "Well, I must not be the new person because this evidence shows me I am not," then you will not get the changes you prefer.

The truth is that the evidence is a neutral set of props that you are interpreting according to an older point of view. You are not shifting back to the "old you" until you decide and fall into agreement with that perspective and interpret the evidence to mean that. When you do that, you are shifting your decision and pivoting on the evidence. Since all circumstance is fundamentally neutral, you can always look at both sides in order to find the perspective that will support the decision of who you are.

All things in your reality are symbols, and you can interpret them in many ways. If something comes along when you have decided, "I am a particular person," and it seems to look contrary to who you are, keep in mind that you are the one deciding what that symbol means, and it can actually mean something else. This gives you the option to see the symbol in a way that supports you. So, the very same symbol that before seemed to be contrary to your decision can actually be used to support you.

See how that symbol helps you, and if that's obvious, use it. If it is not obvious, you can insist that it must be because it happened after you made your decision and you have decided to maintain your positive decision. When you do this, nothing can "talk you out of it," and here comes "the bonus," the face of the evidence changes.

When you don't continually vacillate your decision, your results are not continually vacillating. When you, as "the samurai, maintain a resolve" of who you are no matter what and allow everything to reflect the support of that decision very, very quickly chronologically, the actual face of the evidence also seems to transform to now support who you are.

Trust Your Decision

In the end, the circumstances of life are still neutral evidence, but it's much easier to label them as helpful when your decision is unswerving and consistent. When something comes along that seems to be evidence against your decision, "Ah! Perhaps in the past, I would have said that proves my decision did not stick, and I cannot even see how that particular 'incident' supports my decision, but I know that it does because nothing is extraneous in reality. And, if it is important for me to see how it supports my decision, then I will down the line." If it is important for you to see it, you will.

If you play that game of trying to prove this stuff with yourself, when something comes along and it appears to contradict your decision, you can use that as an opportunity to really prove to yourself that "I'm still this person anyway, even though that's happening." That is a service from your external circumstances and your feedback mechanism. It is something that shows you "I'm not changing my decision, even if that were true, which I know it's not, because I've made the decision, and I'm now maybe not able to see how this supports the decision, but it doesn't matter. I know that it does. I still decide, 'I am this person,' on to the next thing."

You already do this. When you constantly change your decision, you get constantly changing results. On the other hand, when you maintain your decision, it smooths out quickly. And there is your power.

We're not asking you to do anything new. We're not asking you to acquire new skills, build new muscles, or exercise your mentality. We're asking you to understand the way that you already express yourself and, if you feel like it, to do it consciously. When you do that, you reap the rewards of a universe, which is only inside of you anyway. It supports your new decision and allows you to celebrate the expression of who you are rather than dread it, as sometimes some of you do.

You Have Everything You Need

You have everything you need and always have. You are reflecting to yourself in perfect timing, through whatever means, whether you perceive it as me, whether you perceive it as a book, or whether you perceive it as someone you have spoken to. In the end, it is truly you revealing to yourself, through your own timing, what you already know. You are fundamentally an infinite being, and that means you already contain everything.

As a physical being in this linear reality, you do not always feel like you contain everything. Nevertheless, you can remind yourself that you do and get from the totality the specific linear things that will be of service to you in the moment. It is always right now, even right now. And right now is when you always make that decision. In every given “now” moment, which seems like a successive succession of “nows.” It is truly one eternal “now” from the infinite perspective. You have it all. You always have, and it is a matter of being willing to express it as fully as you wish.

Conclusion

You will find in interacting with me that this is my own approach, not that I am saying that it is better, but I am vouching for the effectiveness of it. Never have I regretted in any way being myself and reaping the rewards and reflections of who I am in my reality. This is one option for you as well if you wish. Only you know who you are. Thank you for your willingness to share the gift, the spark of consciousness that you are, and your unique, 100% individual perspective.

How to Speed Up Manifestations

Here are some tips on how you can speed up your manifestations. First, we remind you that you create your physical reality, and you do so through your actions. We like to keep reminding you that your beliefs, your emotions, and your thoughts are a foundation for those actions. That foundation has a subtle effect on the actions, and it is that subtle effect through the actions that creates the reality.

One thing that we want you to notice and pay attention to is that your words, what you say, will often be an indicator of your truest beliefs. The words will often, in and of themselves, be a direct indicator for certain ideas that perhaps you no longer wish to carry around but nevertheless do indeed perpetuate. The fact that you talk about it in a certain way is an indicator that you still, to some degree, hold certain beliefs.

Hope vs Intention

Often a person will use words such as “Well, I hope this will happen.” Or if there is something they truly wish to manifest, they will say, “Well, I hope. I can only hope that this thing that I truly believe is most reflective of who I am will occur.”

“Hope,” when used in this way, implies an underlying sense of doubt and often despair. In this condition of doubt and despair, “it would take a ray of hope, a miraculous occurrence in order to allow me to do the thing that I wish.”

Now, needless to say, this is not the approach of a conscious creator. “Well, I hope. Well, I think it would take a miracle for me to express who I am.”

Rather than pointing this out, let us provide an alternative way to word that, which then vibrationally sets up a new cause, a new effect, and a different result. When you find yourself saying “I hope” or “I can only hope,” substitute the word “hope” with the word “intend.” “I intend to do this, period.”

This approach still leaves you leeway and still states to the universe that “This is what is representative of who I am. I trust my timing; however, I realize that perhaps I cannot act on it right now. So, I do not hope that this will happen. I know that it will. I just don’t know when.”

When you state it as an intention, you crystallize the request to the universe itself. Many of the things that excite you are not immediately available. You cannot do anything about them right now. But that does not mean that you cannot be excited now, and that excitement is held from you, unless that is what you choose to decide in this moment.

The Most Exciting Option Available

What allows you to get through the moment and get closer to the time in which you will be able to manifest the most exciting thing is by affirming or stating to the universe that “this is my intention.”

If something is not available in a given moment, when you state it as an intention, that sets up the vibration that “Alright, I acknowledge what is in the moment. I choose with my excitement and act with integrity on it. But I wish to remind you, oh, universe, that I still intend to do this. I will act like the creator in the moment, but one of the things I still have the choice to do is restate my request in the form of an intention, not a hope.”

When the thing that excites you the most is not available in that moment, pay attention to what you can do and what is in front of you. From the choices available to you in the current moment, choose the option with integrity that most excites you. This method sets up the groundwork for the most exciting thing and sets up the details leading from where you “are” to “where you wish to be.”

Focus on Excitement, Not Details

Paradoxically, if in a given moment, there is something that is not available to you and you establish a lengthy and complex set of details that you feel will be the only likely way to get to that intended idea from where you are, you are then fixating on the details. When you do that, often, it is at the cost of the intention itself. When you have a clear intention, the details of how that clear intention plays out are automatic, and they do not require attention. They will be spontaneous in any given moment.

When you do this, things will introduce themselves that were not available in a past moment. When you try to figure out the details, you limit yourself because you are not able to take into consideration many unforeseen things that will develop. When you fixate on a particular set of logical details, often this will have you focused in a very fine way, and then often you will not even notice the new circumstances that come up that do actually allow you to accomplish what it is you wish to do far faster than the complicated, detailed way that you figured was the only possible way.

What this all boils down to is to loosen up on the details of how your creations will come about and instead tighten up on the intention and your unswerving willingness to maintain a clear intention.

Act on What Is Exciting

By extension, in any given moment, there are always things that are available that you can act on. If there are things that you wish to do that are not immediatelyactable on, put that aside but in the form of an intention: "I still intend to do this, but for now, I will regroup myself to the moment in the form of seeing what is right in front of me." Choose from the choices or options available in any given moment with that excitement. Allowing that excitement to make it most obvious which choice is most representative of who you choose to be.

Focus on the Excitement, Not Why

Act on what is available without any insistence on the outcome. Act because it excites you and allows the details of how the results play out to fall as they will. Often when people act on something very exciting, they focus on the outcome rather than concentrating on the energy of the excitement as a motivation.

The outcome is not always the point of the excitement. Many times, perhaps most, it will be. Something will excite you, and when you act on it, it will play out in an expected way. But if you find that you are acting on something with your excitement and that excitement begins to shift, you don't need to assume that you have failed. That shift is a part of whatever your intention is, and it may again not play out in a given moment from what is available according to expectation.

When you maintain the expectancy that it will play out somehow to your advantage, you loosen up on the details. You maintain the intention of the excitement itself. You don't need to despair if something that excited you begins to lose the excitement. If you have acted on that excitement, you have taken certain steps. By taking those steps, you received some results. You may imagine that it must play out in a certain way, but it may simply be those very minute steps that you took that gave you the information, and the excitement was, in this case, the carrot leading you there.

When that excitement shifts, you can do one of two things: you can say, “Oh no! I’ve lost my sense of purpose” and wander around aimlessly, or you can say, “Alright! How fascinating! I would never have guessed it. Not as I expected! Congratulations!”

Continue to Focus on What’s Available

When you focus on what is now right in front of you, you will find different things to be in front of you than when you were acting on the other exciting thing. Grounding yourself back into the moment and then asking, “From what is available right now, what excites me?” allows you to continue on the momentum toward the clear intention.

Excitement Takes Care of the Details

Fixating on “Uh-oh! Now what?” when the excitement seems to shift does not allow you to continue the fluid movement. One exciting thing leads to the next, whether or not it seems in any way to be connected. The excitement, the vibration of the excitement itself, is the connection. It tells you it is related. It tells you what the details are in order to get you, as you create it, from “here to there.” That excitement is, in fact, ultimately what winds up being the details.

When you follow your excitement, it will lay down the very details that will lead you to your clear intention. When again you fixate on the details, “Well, I must take care of every little detail in order to have my intention take place,” very often you will sometimes, if not always, do so at the cost of the excitement in the moment and being yourself fully in the moment. This has always been the case in anything that you have ever done anyway. The details will work themselves out.

Sometimes you have certain deadlines or other things that you have agreed to. If that is the case, by all means, honor those and use what is available in doing so and choose within those terms whichever one is the most exciting.

You don’t need to be responsible for how everything will play out. If you begin to trust in your moment-to-moment excitement, then the details will become part of the process rather than the process itself. This will lead you to the shortest path of least resistance to the most exciting things. When you fixate on the particular details themselves at the cost of the intention, then you will slow down the process by adding more events and separations, which creates more time to experience them.

What I am suggesting is that when you substitute hope with intention by acting on what is available and then maintain that intention, everything else takes care of itself. If you allow it to be, it can be that easy. It’s up to you. You are all such completely perfect, 100% creators.

In our society, we never pay attention to the details. They are always an automatic, effervescently, ever-flowing set of events that simply automatically results from having a clear intention and then acting on the excitement in the moment. From my perspective, not that I am important in the overall scheme of your life and daily happenings, but in our reality, in our society, this works.

When you follow your excitement in each moment, and perhaps down the line, see how things that were entirely unrelated to the most exciting things led directly to it, you will establish the trust I am speaking of.

One other thing that simply does not exist in our society is doubt. We never have any form of trust that is not consciously placed. Remember, doubt is not a lack of trust; it is complete trust in the very thing you say you don't prefer. We always choose to express our complete trust in whatever is right in front of us. We trust in our ability to create perfectly by following the vibration that is most representative of who we as individuals are.

This always results in the fulfillment of all your dreams and wishes. However, it also has a positive side effect, which is that it always is of ultimate service to society, to all other individuals, and to the planet itself. When you act with integrity, that takes into consideration everything else since everything is an extension of you. The respect you will afford to these extensions will be mirrored back to you in your reality. You will, as you are willing to validate externally, have that mirrored back to you 100-fold in the form of what you would perceive to be self-validation.

Little Shifts Are All It Takes

When you make slight minute shifts in your perspective and point of view, there are grand changes in your entire reality. Those tiny little points of view are what have resulted in the life that you are living. What is positive in your life is a result of tiny shifts in point of view, and what is perhaps perceived to you or by you as negative is also only a slight point of view.

There is no mountain to move. Your life is the expression of the mountain of your consciousness and simply moves as you choose to move it and always has. The slight shift in perspective is all that is necessary and has been what has already resulted in the reality that you now hold.

Each time you find a perspective, as easy as it may be, that works for you and allows you to express your fullness, your integrity, your power, that can be “all it takes,” as you say, to transform your entire life. I am not saying that from the assumption that all of you have lives that need great transformation. I recognize that much of what you have now created is satisfactory to you. However, we are discussing going a step further.

You Can Have It All

You can have it all, and when I say that, note your reaction, for if your reaction to any degree is, “Well, yeah, sure,” you can then see where you still draw the line within you because when I say all, everything that you desire, I mean it literally.

You Have Great Power

But it is up to you and your willingness to accept that you can have it all. And this does not mean that it needs to be at the expense of anyone else or at the expense of your integrity. Your power is so great, and you have as much power as you need to accomplish anything you wish in your life without harming yourself or anyone else. Conversely, you can do this while being of service to yourself and everyone else.

That is the degree of power that you have. Your power is so great that you can create the apparency that you don't even have that much power. I understand, perhaps, this sounds like a contradiction of terms, but think about it. Ponder how much power one would need to have, to have so much of it that one could actually convince themselves they are helpless. That is an expression of great power.

You have such great power that you can experience yourself as a discrete individual with a high degree of amnesia of the soul. To forget over 99% of everything you know is an expression of great power.

Once you recognize that you have done so purposely in order to explore the remaining 1% without the confusion of the other 99%, you will see that it is an expression of your power far greater than the splitting of the atom. That is simply fractional in comparison to the power that you express on a moment-to-moment basis, from day to day, week to week, month to month, year to year in your life. You have so much power that you have created the entire reality that you are within, and only have the apparency of you being a player within it.

We Respect You

It may seem contradictory to say this is power, but it is. We respect and revel in your bold willingness to explore the degree of separation and limitation that you, as a society, have chosen. There are many consciousnesses out there that are not nearly so bold and that never do choose to participate in this style of creation. Those consciousnesses have great respect for all of you. Ironically, you often respect the other consciousnesses out there, but you are far more respected by them for your bold conviction.

When we say you are the masters of limitation, we do not say that so we can berate or chastise you. We understand that being a master takes many forms. The choice to master limitation and separation itself is a bold choice.

When you choose to express your power to the degree where you will choose from time to time not to feel your connection and create the sense of being alone is very brave. However, you have done so just fine. You have shown yourself that you can do even that. By maintaining your clear intention from this point forward, on what it is you now wish to do, you can begin to express your mastership of unlimitedness. It is up to you.

You Get to Choose

Whatever you decide, “all that is” will love you unconditionally. Whatever you decide, we will love you unconditionally as well. In addition to maintaining your clear intention and allowing the details to fall into place, if you follow our lead of choosing to match our unconditional and apply it to yourself, you will accelerate your timing and manifestations.

Embrace the Unexpected

When you validate who you are, you can be yourself fully, effortlessly, and directly. That removes the resistance toward you being yourself and the fact that you have actually chosen to express yourself with this style of amnesia because you realize that it allows you to discover and learn things as if for the first time.

The “first time” is something that you cherish. When you watch television or a movie, you enjoy them far more the first time because you have no idea what’s going to happen. You have a saying that “There’s nothing like the first time,” which you apply to many things. You could not have that experience at all if you already knew everything because you would always know what to expect.

Part and parcel of this physical reality itself is the experience of the unexpected. Consider looking at the unexpected with joy because that is one of the points of this reality. Often people get upset because they don’t know what’s going to happen, which paradoxically makes them upset for one of the very reasons they chose to create this reality.

If you ground yourself in this idea, you can appreciate that in our society, when one individual approaches another and asks, “How is it going?” and the answer is, “Not as I expected,” our reply is, “Congratulations!” You, too, can congratulate yourself when something occurs that is entirely contrary to what you expected. That is the details playing themselves out, leading you toward your clear intention.

If you label unexpected things as interruptions, you slow down your own process. If, instead, you say with positive surprise, “Well, how unexpected! Congratulations! What are the new circumstances? Oh! New choices! Choose with my excitement? Oh, joy!” It can be that simple. When something unexpected comes up, that is the point. That is allowing you to experience that first time that you all say you love so much. Remember, you created this reality so that you didn’t know what was going to happen, so you don’t need to try to figure it out.

Embrace the unexpected. Revel in the unexpected. Swim. Dive into the unexpected. Rather than approaching the unexpected as an interruption, explore willingly and purposefully. “Alright, this is unexpected. Congratulations!”

Perhaps at first, you are simply humoring yourself by doing this, but if you set up the vibration of congratulating yourself, you can then extend that to beginning to look at “Now that I have created this unexpected set of circumstances, what new advantages lie within it?”

If you look for the advantages of unexpected occurrences, you get them. You will see something new to act on that was not present before and, by definition unexpected. When you do that, you accelerate your timing toward your clear intention.

If you decide to interpret the unexpected as an interruption, you then act interrupted and get the result of having been interrupted. You then create the connection that “Well, when something unexpected comes up, it always has a negative result.” It is not the unexpected thing itself that has a negative result; it is your assignment of meaning, your interpretation of the unexpected thing, that yields the result.

Conclusion

I do not hope that you will continue to read, for I am sure that you will. I am not concerned about the details of how this will play out. In fact, I am not concerned about anything. I am not concerned about the details of what the next chapter will be about. It simply is unimportant to this moment. What is important to this moment is that you are here. Thank you for this gift that you bequeath, by participating, unto me and my respective society. I thank you, for it is a great gift that we do relish.

How to Build Momentum

In this chapter, we will talk a bit more about how to build your momentum. Momentum is actually an apperency, but nevertheless, it can be a useful concept.

Often when we see your society and interact with you, we find that you put out mixed signals. We and many others on your planet have pointed out that you are the creators of your reality. One of the things that allows you to be an effective creator is clarity. By that, we mean clarity of your intention and vision.

Very often, individuals will, from time to time, be vague about what it is that they wish to do or, in fact, have contradictory definitions that send out mixed messages to the universe.

One particular example is that as you grow up, you are taught to “expect the best, but prepare for the worst (just in case).” This is a paradox, an irony, and is self-contradictory.

Preparing for the worst is a statement. In order to prepare, you take action that actually puts out more blatantly the message of expecting the worst rather than expecting the best. If you, as a concept, expect the best, but your actions reflect expectations of the worst even though you are expecting the best, those actions, that preparation in and of itself, midwives in “the worst outcome.”

Thoughts Don't Create Reality

We often talk about how your attitude shapes reality. However, that is only a middle person doing so because, in the end, it is the actions that you assume that literally create the reality. Actions are what brings thing from mentalizing and thought into reality. We have discussed that if your interpretation and attitude toward a situation is negative, that you at least provide one other positive alternative before proceeding, so at least you have the choice.

Whatever idea you act on as a foundation, the actions are what create the reality in this physical set of circumstances. You can, therefore, think anything you wish. You can think, “I express the best,” but what you do determines it. So, if “I” in thinking “expect the best” but in action “prepare for the worst,” that preparation, that defense, sets up the attack.

Preparing Reinforces the Worst

The preparation for the worst is the same as saying, “I truly believe I will receive the worst outcome, and as a reinforcement for the fact that I believe this, I will set up a defense, I will set up protection, just in case.” That “just in case” clause is what allows more probability for a negative outcome.

As we have discussed many times, all situations in your life are neutral and have no built-in meaning. The meaning that you assign in a given situation determines the effect you get out. This works across the board. When you prepare for the worst, you are assigning the meaning that “I expect the worst. Here is blatant proof from my actions that I expect the worst. I am setting up protection, just in case.”

If you wish, from now on, you can decide what it is that you wish to occur. Decide if you wish to be looking out for the best or the worst in any given situation. Be purposeful about it. If you decide to expect the best from what is available, from what is right there, then pay particular attention to how you act. If you find that you are preparing just in case, stop yourself, and ask yourself, “What must I believe to be doing this,” and you will find the overwhelming primary belief is that “the worst is yet to come.”

Use Your Imagination

If you decide that you want the most positive outcome in any neutral situation, use your imagination to provide an alternative scenario. If you take action while expecting and preparing for the worst, then those are the actions of someone who believes in the worst outcome. You are infinite creators with infinite choices.

You already have the model for the negative outcome, and so you can also use your imagination to project, “Alright. Now that I see what preparing for the worst is a representation of and what belief is behind that idea, I will give myself that other alternative. I will look before I leap. Alright, what do I imagine that I or a person who truly believed,” if you wish to remove it one step from yourself, “in a positive outcome would do in this situation?” Allow your imagination that tool to provide you with a specific self-tailored answer, and then look at those actions. They will differ, I assure you, from the protective mode, the expecting and preparing for the worst mode. Then, you will have two sets of actions. Then you have a choice. You will always find that your imagination can always, in any given situation, provide a set of actions that will be representational of your desired outcome and, in fact, of your desired path.

This Is an Easy Process

You already create with this mechanism, though often, because you have bought into social beliefs, you use your imagination to prepare for the worst. In any case, you already do this. It is not a matter of building up any strength, exercising, or creating a new ability. No. It is taking the ability you already have and applying it according to preference, according to your integrity, according to your excitement, and according to what you desire. You can do this all because you know if you are acting with integrity, then you will be of service to both yourself and to others. The only reason you need to choose a positive perspective is because you say so, and that is all. That is really all there is to it. You get to choose.

From Automatic to Conscious

If you automatically make a choice without thought or thinking, it is still a choice. When you do not provide other options, it may seem like the only choice, but you can use your imagination in any situation.

Whenever you are in some specific situation that is right in front of you, you can always hand it over to the referential preferential you in your imagination. Watch what it does before you act. You can still act in a negative way; nothing is being lost or taken from you. However, often when you have even just one positive alternative that comes from the vibration of who you prefer to be, and you give yourself the benefit of the doubt, you then have at least one better option.

If you are in a neutral situation and two things are lying in front of you, one of which is an automatic reaction that will obviously yield a negative result, and the other a positive set of actions that would give a more positive result, it is not difficult to choose. You are then not acting on automatic pilot.

You are on automatic pilot when you feel something and act without thinking about it or any kind of evaluation. It has become automatic to do so. However, when you give yourself positive choices, through the referential preferential you, at first, it may take some effort because you are replacing your habit of acting according to negative assignment with a new alternative. You will find that at first, yes, you need to go through that set of steps, and you'll need to conjure up the preferred you and hand the situation over and watch what it does. When you see what comes up, you will rejoice at the ingenuity within you.

You will quickly find if you act on what your imagination provides in this specific way, that you will be getting the results you prefer and also begin to do that automatically. You don't need a process. You only need to change your perspective, your interpretation, and your attitude. Evaluate before you act. It is that easy.

Eventually, your preferential you and your imagination will automatically cough up the actions right away. The old approach will fade, and in order to even find the old negative interpretation, attitude, and actions, you will need to grope around. It really only takes a slight shift in your perspective. Just say, "There might be an alternative here. I know that what I am about to do will have a negative result. I know it. It happens all the time."

You Contain All the Answers

You can give yourself the alternative, and you do not need to call me, open a book, or call a friend. You can do this. We are not discouraging sharing what you find, but what I am saying is that you contain within you everything you need to transform. You don't need anything outside of yourself.

When you consult your referential preferential you in your imagination, it will take on a life of its own and gradually, though sometimes quickly, you will find yourself automatically being that you out of preference, out of joy, out of desire, because you say so, and because you are sick of settling for less than who you desire to be. You really can expect the best and prepare for the best, much in the way that you used to prepare for the worst.

We hope this is clear.

You Always Deliver the Best to Us

We always expect the best from you and have never one single time been disappointed. We are not here to give you something you must have and are deprived without. No. In fact, we are not even here to really say that you are doing anything wrong. No. You are who you are. You are the creators of your reality. We are who we are, the creators of our reality. We desire and choose, by choice, to share our perspectives because they have worked for us. But make no bones about it; your perspective has worked just as well for you. However, we detect that you desire positive outcomes, perfect positive outcomes, perhaps as opposed to the perfect mixed outcomes that you already created.

What we share is not something that you are missing. You contain what I am sharing. We just allow you to see that the seed already exists within you. All you need is to add a little bit of water and a little bit of light. It will grow automatically. We are not planting anything within you. Anything you find as joyful, helpful, or ecstatic that comes from our stream of information only does so and only translates and make sense to you because you all already contain it.

Hello

My purpose is simply to share with no insistence involved. Whenever I interact with any individual from your society or from any of the many societies that we interact with, I always expect the best. You are the best you that you are now expressing, and we have never in any way been let down. Even if you don't believe in yourself, I would still believe in you anyway. So, therefore, I never will be let down.

You can feel the same way about yourself; otherwise, you would not even be able to perceive that I feel that way about you. I thank you for exploring the many avenues, knocking down the maze of walls you create within your consciousness, and expressing yourself as one unbroken continuous whole consciousness. That is what you are from our perspective.

How to Deal with People

When you think about dealing with people, it's important to understand the nature of truth. From our perspective, the ultimate truth is composed of all truths. In order for it to be the ultimate truth, you can leave nothing out. All truths are true to those who believe them.

While it may seem on the surface like the truths that you hold exclude the beliefs and truths of others, it only seems that way from your perspective. From the perspective of the ultimate truth, it is all true. It is not "this or that"; it is both. It is "this and that." Both.

We understand that at first, this may seem a little strange to your ears. "Well, if it's this, it can't be that. Everybody knows that!" However, the individuals who believe that say the same thing about you. They are no less correct in the overall ultimate sense than you are. This does not mean that particular truths are less and more positive or more negative or less negative but that all truths, all belief systems, have validity. They are all indeed explorations, valid explorations.

They may be explorations of positivity and integration. They may as well be explorations of negativity and separation. However, they all hold equal validity. This does not mean you need to condone a particularly negative viewpoint, but what we are sharing is that all viewpoints are equally valid.

Validating Truths Give You Options

If you realize this, apply it, and see all truths as equal and valid, you then give yourself more options. You can then determine which truths you prefer, find new truths, hold them, apply them, and ultimately manifest and get what you want more easily.

Paradoxically when you invalidate another truth or another choice, you give the thing more weight. You hold it in place. You get more of it. You place attention on it. This all makes you more likely to choose the very thing you say that you don't prefer.

When you are willing to think that there may be some validity in all ideas and truths, that helps you have an open attitude to see how they are valid. It is not that you need to necessarily see how every little thing is valid for you. Some ideas will resonate with you more than others. It is more that even though they may not be relevant for you, from the overall sense of "all that is," God, they have validity,

Interacting with People

This all comes back to interacting with individuals who hold different beliefs than you and yet still maintaining positive integration from your standpoint and still being true to yourself. One question people sometimes ask is, “Well, if someone offers me something that I do not prefer, how do I communicate in an integrated and respectful way to that individual without invalidating them?”

This issue can polarize you so much that you want to immediately scream at the individual, and needless to say, this is not exactly a primary form of validation. However, the solution is very, very simple.

No, Thank You

Your language has the ability to allow you to express yourself while also maintaining a certain civil tone and politeness. One such phrase is “No, thank you. Thanks, but no thanks.” “No, thank you,” in and of itself says two things: it says, “This is not me. I do not prefer it, however, thank you. I validate it, I can picture in some sense how perhaps that serves you, and I thank you for your willingness to present this gift to me.”

The Perspective of Others Are Gifts

When you look at what individuals have to offer as gifts rather than impositions, you give yourself at least an opportunity to glean something from it in positive service.

When you say, “Oh, shut up, you idiot,” you do not allow yourself to glean anything. You shut the door.

We purposefully use that wording for, put it this way, we’ve heard it before on your planet. That’s not to invalidate it either, but to point out that perhaps that will not get you what you want.

You can establish your preference and manifest it. In other words, you can get what you want. But, paradoxically, not by invalidating what you don’t want. When you can validate what you don’t want as being equal, though not at all preferential, you get equal access to what you want.

That’s Their Story

As an analogy, you can label other people’s perspectives, loosely speaking, as “that’s their story.” When someone comes along and shares their point of view, if you will say, “That’s their story,” then that allows you to glean what pages from their story fit into your book. If none of the pages fit into your book, or if only a few actually fit, you don’t need to love their story. It is still just that, their story, a valid story. “This is my story; that is their story.”

When you have an open attitude and recognize that you attract anything and anyone you interact with for some reason, you can keep your eyes more open to see what pages of their book may help to fatten up your own book. More often than not, you will find that even with individuals who seem to have “nothing to offer,” which, by the way, is impossible, may have just a little nuance of something you can use. Maybe it’s just a footnote, but nevertheless, there is something that can be applied to your story.

Everything You Attract Serves a Purpose

You are all each a particular vibration. The vibration that you are is set up by your beliefs, emotions, thoughts, and, ultimately, your actions. You can only experience a reality that you are the vibration of, and so, therefore, anything that you attract, anything, if you will begin to look at it this way, is attracted to you due to the vibration you have become.

When you think about it this way, you will often see many things about the vibration that you have created that you do not prefer and that you wish to change. This will give you the opportunity to begin to hone in on the things that you wish to change, the beliefs that you are holding on to that no longer serve you. When you label something, someone, or any event as extraneous and decide that it doesn't belong, "How did you get in there?" you do not have a receptive attitude, and you shut down any ability to glean anything from it.

You may, if you wish, we will not force you, realize that if you use any portion of what you attract, you are being a conscious creator of your reality and taking back total responsibility for everything that you created.

You define yourself in many ways. One way is to give yourself so many examples of the things you prefer in order to reinforce who you are and what you prefer. Another way, just as valid, is to give yourself so many examples of what you don't prefer. However, you don't have to do it that way.

When you use the things that you've attracted, that may on the surface appear to be something you don't want, you will allow them to deliver their message. When they do, they have no need to hang around, and they transform. This allows you to use the remnant of the creations you have unconsciously drawn to yourself.

You Don't Have to Agree with Everyone

You don't need to agree with anybody's viewpoint. If you are a bit empathetic, you may find that you agree with more than you had thought, and it is of service to you. Everything allows you to define yourself still further. What you do prefer is an indication to you of who you are. What you do not prefer is just as much an indication to you of who you are. They're of equal service.

Validate Everything

You can validate the things you don't prefer and transform their effect on you and out of your life altogether. As you expand, you will still see more of everything, more of what you prefer and more of what you do not prefer. You will see this, and you will be aware of it. This is what the expansion of awareness means. You do not need to personally experience in your world, in your universe, and in your reality the things you say you do not prefer.

The first step toward living that way is to validate the things you don't prefer. Glean from them what you can. Assume that you have attracted them for a reason. That gives you the opportunity to search for what the reason is. Nothing slips in there. Everything that exists, exists, and there are no pointless or extraneous creations, not even you. Everything belongs. Everything is usable.

Use what you've already created and consciously intend what you wish to continue to create. When you do that, you transform the unpreferred out of your immediate experience, and then you only experience that which you do prefer. You live within a universe in which part of the definition is time. Therefore, there will be a little bit of time in between you thinking this way, acting this way, and reaping the benefits.

When someone comes along and says something you do not prefer, just say, "No, thank you. I love your story no less. Thank you for presenting the gift that you did. I will use part of it. Please do not be offended if I do not use the rest."

No Need for Persuasion

Also, when you are offering who you are to someone else, if you truly believe in what you are saying, you don't need to not convince anyone of it. If you truly believe in the power of your ideas, they stand alone on their own. If you find yourself convincing someone of a particular reality that from your perspective is the only way, then you don't realize this. You don't believe in the power of your own idea, and the bottom line is the person that you are really trying to convince is yourself. If you truly believe in the power of your ideas, they are all simply gifts, period.

From our perspective at least, you don't cram your Christmas gifts down each other's throats. You simply offer them with the idea that it will be something that is appreciated. If not, this is why you save the receipt. You do not give a gift insisting that someone must take it. When someone else offers you a gift, be willing to look at the portions of the gift that enhance who you are. When you share who you are with another, that is the most you can do. That is the most responsible you can be, and listen to the wording, "to" not "for" to another individual.

Remember: Be Yourself

You all create your reality. All of you. You can only really be responsible for yourself. You cannot be responsible for someone else, but you can be responsible to them. Being responsible for yourself means giving them the truest reflection of who you are, not who it is you think they want to hear, not saying what it is you think they wish to hear. When you aren't authentic, you are not giving the gift of who you are. In effect, what you are allowing to occur, when you say something that you think someone else wants to hear and that is not reflective of your true beliefs, is allowing them to have a very elaborate conversation with themselves. This does not provide them with the greatest opportunity for growth.

Your perspective is different and unique, and when you offer it without saying that they "need" to take it, it is the greatest opportunity for growth that you can give another, whether or not they accept it. If they accept it, then they will grow from the ideas of expansion that you have shared. If they do not, they have also grown, for they have reasserted to themselves who they are.

Conclusion

We find the ultimate enrichment in our reality is the gifts that you all have to share. It isn't that many of the ideas that you share are always things that we would necessarily use, but we don't invalidate them, any of them. You can do the same; otherwise, we would not be able to interact with you, and when we interact with you, you simply would not hear a word that is being said.

Take it for granted that if you can read this and understand it on any level, you contain it as well. Anything you see in us as a sparkling example is merely a shiny mirror, and what you are looking at that you love in us or any external symbol is what is already within you. We thank you for the light that you emanate. We thank you for the varying packages of your gifts. We validate your gifts, and we enjoy sharing them with you.

How to Manifest Something

Often people want to know straight up front, “Why am I not getting what I want and how do I?” When it comes to success, I remind you that it is the actions that you perform in your life that make the changes, not the mentalizing, though that does lay down the foundation. We appreciate the actions that you have taken. For that, applaud yourselves, please. There was a great deal of applause from our end as well. We were applauding ourselves, of course.

I3DA

One foundational idea that can be key or pivotal in creating your reality is what we have loosely labeled “I3DA.” This refers first to clear intention: I. Intention is you establishing in no uncertain terms what it is you intend to do. No hoping. No wishing. No praying. Simply, “This is who I am.

This is what I intend to do. I do not care how long it takes. Nothing will stop me.”

When you are as clear as possible with what this intention is, you begin the process of crystallization from what you perhaps might call the mental or causal plane into your physical reality.

In terms of the 3DA component:

- Clear deservability: exercising your ability that you deserve to exist and deserve to create a life of joy and ecstasy.
- Clear desire: this is the emotional component, the feeling of the thing that it is you wish to do. This is the feeling generated by your clear intention. This emotional component puts the energy in motion, emotion, energy motion, and begins to thicken the foundation, thicken the vibration, making it that much more able to be acted on.
- Clear definitions: your definitions, as we have discussed many times, are the foundation. Your beliefs and your definitions of life are the foundation that generates emotions and thoughts.
- And ultimately, the clear “A” part action: clear action is what you do, how you move, how you implement the ideas, and it is the implementation of the ideas themselves that midwife or bring them into your physical reality.

You exist simultaneously on an infinite number of levels. You are choosing to explore the physical universe and physical existence. Within that physicality, you express yourself through “a body” format. Ultimately, it is the actions that you perform. Action is the ultimate physical manifestation of your beliefs, emotions, and thoughts. In the end, it always rests in the actions. You act based on the foundation that you set up according to your clear definitions, desires, and deserve ability.

Failure

Intention is what sets up, vibrationally speaking, the template or the model that allows you to bring it into physical reality. From this perspective, “failure” can be defined simply as the unwillingness to maintain your clear intention, period.

You may add anything you wish to this definition, but for the purposes of conciseness and clarity, that is all it is. Letting go of the clear intention, perhaps utilizing circumstances in your life as “evidence,” which is only all circumstantial anyway, is the only way you can truly have the effect you call “failing to do something.”

Success

If you are willing to maintain a clear intention no matter what the face of the reality seems to suggest, then you can never fail. You realize the moment that you are in is not the moment for the playing out of the clear intention. The only way it can be experienced as a failure is when you let go or give up the clear intention. If you maintain a clear intention, you can only manifest success.

Timing Is Important

Remember timing, “before, during, and after,” is one of the things that you explore in physical reality. Since you are creating and flowing through a stream you call “time,” you use this in a particular way you sometimes call “unfoldment.” Rather than knowing it all, you unfold, you experience, you build, and you accumulate, then you express and experience, having then accumulated all the knowledge and tools to appreciate that expression most fully.

When something that you clearly intend to happen isn't happening in a given moment, you can remember that it is timing. You may think on the surface, “Well, I'm ready for this; why isn't it happening? The universe doesn't work. I give up,” or you can simply say, “Well, let me think about this for a moment. Obviously, I still wish to do this. It is something I desire, so therefore, I intend to do it. Obviously, it is not happening now; however, something is happening now, and if I concentrate on the intended thing that is not happening right now, I cannot even see what is happening right now.”

You can remind yourself, “Alright, this is my clear intention. It obviously is not available in this moment, but I have earned this, and I will not give it up. I will, however, maintain it as a clear intention and put it aside.” Once you put it aside, maintaining it, fully intending that that will happen, you open up your vision to what is available in any given moment. You are no longer obscuring what is available with what is not available.

When you do this, you use timing and synchronicity to your greatest advantage. Allow it to be as obvious as possible. “What is in this given moment, the only moment I ever experience, right now? The clear intention is not available. Alright, what is?” When you recognize what is right in front of you, not what isn’t, by its very definition, you re-ground yourself into the moment.

Choose What Is Available

In every single moment, you will always find, no matter what if you look, there are choices, choices that are unique to that moment. If you obscure them with things that are not available, you will make it more difficult to see them. Maintain your intention and allow it to be the most obvious of what is available.

Sometimes, yes, the choices may be between rather mundane things. But, it is your assignment that they are mundane that gives you the effect of them being mundane. For example, suppose that you have, loosely speaking, in a given moment three choices: “I can watch TV, read a book, or take a walk.” One of those choices in that moment will stand out as being perhaps a little, perhaps a lot, more exciting than the other two.

Choose from what is available with your excitement and preference, simply because it’s all right to get what you prefer and what excites you. Act on that particular opportunity, looking at it as an opportunity, but act on it with integrity.

That Action Will Serve You

For instance, if you choose to take the walk, do so fully, fully cognizant. Walk down that street and experience the grandeur of that unique choice in that moment. That literally realigns you to the clear intention. As odd as it sounds, it quickly aligns you to the thing that is not available that you intend to do but that does not seem available in that moment, even according to your timeline. Until you take the walk, it may not be obvious how that has served you.

Once you are willing to allow yourself to function from this perspective and take that walk, and dive into that walk, and keep your eyes open on that block either while you are taking the walk or down the line, it will become completely obvious how that was absolutely instrumental in allowing you to accomplish your clear intention. Whether it is subtle or blatant, but this is also part of the idea.

Maintaining Your Intention Is Success

When you give up on your clear intention, for example, because it is not available in that moment, that is the only way you can manifest failure. We define success as maintaining your clear intention, trusting in it, pushing aside the fact that it might not be available at that time in that moment, and then focusing on what is available and that you can do something about. It doesn't need to be more complicated than this.

If you maintain the clear intention, you will accomplish the idea. If you release and give up the clear intention, then you change what you are aligned to and what you are dialing into your reality.

If you go back and forth, “Well, I have this clear intention, I will keep it,” then you realize that you don’t have it at that moment and so give up on it, and then again down the line say, “Well, I really did want that intention. I’ll have it back now.” You’ll still get the intention, but you slow down the process.

Excitement Is Your Proof

You slow down the process when you occasionally give up the clear intention. When you take the walk, for example, with full awareness and integrity, you speed up the process. What tells you that the walk is related to the clear intention is the excitement itself. Everything that you are excited about is related.

People will often say, “Well, I am excited about so many things! Oh! This is so confusing! Oh! Woe is me.” All those things are one expression, multifaceted, multidimensional facets, but of one expression of your excitement, which is the vibration that tells you who you chose to be in the most blatant and obvious of terms. That is why you have excitement.

Anxiety

When you interpret your excitement through negative terminology, through doubt, which is truly misplaced trust, you experience it as anxiety. Both anxiety and excitement are the same energy. The difference is that in one case, you’re interpreting things positively and the other negatively. The negative comes in the form of doubt or misplaced trust.

Right Here, Right Now

You have it all right in front of you, literally, in every given moment. The only thing that makes it appear that you do not is not looking at what that moment holds and not thinking in terms of the fact that what is in that moment is unique to that moment.

“Well,” you can say, “I took a walk yesterday.” That is one way to look at it, but this walk today is a completely different walk. If you take this walk with the attitude that these choices are unique to this moment and the results of these choices will be unique to this moment as well, you will then take a completely different walk.

Life Will Feel Fresh

When you take this approach, you will find that your life begins to feel fresh rather than stale. Our particular perspective is that everything is new, and everything is experienced as happening for the first time. This approach creates an eagerness and an attitude of fascination. It is quite contagious, and it is quite effortless to adopt or adapt. It is up to you.

Always Be Successful

You can always consider yourself successful by maintaining your clear intention and not allowing the circumstance of your reality to “talk you out of it.” If you are maintaining and acting according to your clear intention, then you are successful. That’s it. Failure is when you succumb to the circumstantial evidence rather than as a creator, establishing what you intend to do simply because you deserve to do the things you intend to do.

When you act on your excitement with integrity, it will only serve you and only serve others. So why not choose to be successful? What is there to lose? It is up to you.

Fear of Failure (or Success)

Sometimes you talk about the “fear of failure” or the “fear of success.” This is an interesting Catch 22. Fear of failure is when you don’t believe you create your reality. It is what happens when you don’t understand the mechanism that we just shared, which is that you can never fail as long as you maintain the clear intention and reground yourself to the moment by acting on your excitement with integrity.

From this perspective, if you find that you have a fear of failure, you may now begin to look at it through these “new glasses.” Understand that there is nothing to fear. One of the reasons that your intention sometimes is not immediately available is because the tools and resources that you need to fully experience it are not yet there. You will never get what you intend before you are ready. This doesn’t mean that you are failing. It just means you need more time for research.

Fear of success, on the other hand, generally arises from the feeling that you could create a reality that you cannot handle. From our perspective, this is a contradiction of terms. It would be a pointless creation, and there are no pointless or extraneous creations to create something you could not handle. The mere fact that you are creating anything in any given moment is an option, and that you can do it is “your sign,” as you sometimes ask for that. You can handle it.

Realign and realize that you cannot experience what you sometimes put in slang terminology, “an idea before its time.” It simply is not possible. When the idea is forthcoming, that is the time, obviously; otherwise, there would be pointless and extraneous creations. If you think about it, it simply will make no sense.

You don’t need to fear failure if you maintain your clear intention, and you don’t need to fear success if you understand that you only create things when the timing is just right. By just the right timing, we mean the time at which you can express and most fully appreciate what you are creating.

Conclusion

Thank you all for your blazing successes that you sometimes call failures. From our perspective, nothing is extraneous, and nothing you can do will stop your growth. You always grow. This is one of the fascinating aspects of infinite creation and fascinating aspects of individuality. You already always contain it all, and yet you will always simultaneously, I understand that seems contradictory, be expanding and growing forever and ever and ever and ever and ever and ever and so on and so forth, “scooby-dooby.” We appreciate that you sometimes pick yourselves up by your own bootstraps, though many of you do not wear boots. I thank you.

Hello